After due pause and deliberation, the senior wrangler is announced, and the other candidates are grouped in the order of merit. The name of the leader is flashed over all Britain, and he becomes at once a figure. As he is generally a youth under twenty-four, and has narrowed his life to this one thing for some ten years, a bad case of "swelled head" is the almost inevitable result. The "conceit of a wrangler" is a stock phrase at Cambridge. It is told of one of them that, having gone to a London theatre, and hearing the audience break into applause, he arose, remarking, "Confound it, they've found me out," and began to bow to the four quarters. At the third turn he faced the Princess

THINGS & PEOPLE

By BOSWELL Jr.

THE divigations of Rev Sheldon with the Topeka Capital illustrate what has often been stated in this department—to run a newspaper intelligently one must have learnt journalism. Perhaps the chief lesson taught in the exercise of editorial authority is what not to publish. On the basis that anything which happens is news and that all news must be printed it is easy to set any community by the ears. This is the working theory of yellow journalism, though it is not interested in the good things which occur, but only in the evil. In the office of the Examiner the definition of railroad news is anything that injuriously reflects on the Southern Pacific or C. P. Huntington. When a new scale was adopted by the Market Street Railway increasing the wages of employees in accordance with the term of their service, the fact was recorded in a brief paragraph. It was creditable to the corporation, consequently of no importance to its readers. On the contrary, had the corporation excluded from its yard some walking delegate who was disturbing its force, the Examiner would have emblazoned the story all over its front page, and claimed it as another wrong to labor. However, that is another story. Rev. Sheldon is making a newspaper for the members of his own congregation, not for the general reader. He is exploiting the subjects in which he, as a minister, is personally interested, and excluding matter which his religious set has banned as immoral. No theatrical news and but little business news, the Sunday school exalted, prohibition discussed—topics important at a ministers' meeting given first consideration. If the world were exclusively composed of church-goers perhaps there might be some point in such a publication, but it is not.

A newspaper is seldom better than its proprietor. If he be a man of strong personality and rigid principle the attitude towards it of the community in which it is published will be exactly that which the members of that community take towards the proprietor as an individual. He may be unpopular because he has thwarted nefarious designs or injured delicate feelings, but he will be respected and his opinion accepted as valuable. The newspaper is judged as the man is Its judgment may be questioned, but in the face of evil reports set afloat by the enemies it makes, character tells. But mere abstract virtue is not sufficient. Such a newspaper must be as active a force as its rivals. It must have the news, but it need not publish scandal or give undue space to crime. There are legitimate sensations. The conduct of the officers of the city and state government, for instance, is a fair field for report and investigation. Proceedings of the courts, with restrictions prescribed by the moral amenities, politics and political gossip, the theatres, sport of all kinds, events of commercial interest—such subjects as legitimately engage the attention of men and women should furnish ample material for the press. In addition there must be sensible editorials, explanatory and informative, written by men expert on the subjects treated. A competent, capable newspaper can be made as saleable as a yellow journal, provided it is as vigorously pushed. Success is not attained so rapidly, but the circulation achieved is permanent. The difficulty is, however, that energy and enterprise are generally found behind the sensation monger, whereas the editor of the respectable daily imagines that decency is necessarily dull and makes no effort to enliven his columns.

A Martyr to His Faith.

THE theoretical supremacy of mind over matter was subjected to a severe test in Seattle last week, though in the end grim Death stepped in and secured the victory. Rev. Joseph Adams, formerly a Congregationalist minister, but later an apostle of his own beliefs, proved a martyr to his faith. A strikingly handsome man, with clear cut features and flowing locks, he had, by the mere strength of his personality alone, converted hundreds to his faith. For many years he had preached his conception of true faith, a belief founded on the universal brotherhood of man and a metaphysical theory, the power of mind over matter. "Brother Joseph," as his followers called him, was a true believer in his doctrines. When he was taken ill he refused medical aid, firmly convinced that he could cure himself by sheer force of will power. Alone in his room, he fought out the struggle between his material and spiritual self. What torments he endured during those nights of silent but terrible struggle can only be imagined. But steadfast in his belief, since his mind could not conquer, he retreated before the steady encroachment of the disease, dying but remaining true to his faith. Rev. Adams was a remarkable man. He commenced his career as a Congregationalist minister, the pastor of a large church in San Jose, Cal., but gave up the Christian faith for one of his own. He commenced an evangelistic tour, preaching the universal brotherhood of the human kind. Once he was the head of an equality colony in a farming district in Washington. At the time of his death he was lecturing before a metaphysical society, a socialist club and an organization called "Everybody's church."

Honor Where Honor is Due.

WITH eminent unfairness the Examiner loudly credits itself with "victories" with which it had no more to do than any one of a dozen factors engaged in the same undertaking. Ordinarily one may dismiss such boasting with a smile, but in the matter of the preservation of the Calaveras grove of big trees, the ladies of the California Club are clearly entitled to the credit of inaugurating this crusade and maintaining to its successful conclusion. When the report of the threatened sale of this grove was first announced, Mrs. Robert J. Burdette called the attention of a body of ladies, who had met in Los Angeles to organize a State Federation of Women's Clubs, to the threatened destruction of the grove, and urged the ladies there assembled to interest themselves in the matter. When Mrs. Lovell White, president of the California Club, returned from the South she laid the facts before the Executive Board and, with the subsequent consent of the Club, resolutions were adopted urging Congress to purchase the big trees. Previous to this no plan had been formulated. The resolutions were sent to all organizations of men and women throughout the State, and to the Federated clubs throughout the United States. A member of the California Club had already communicated with Hon. Julius Kahn, who put the matter in the hands of Congressman De Vries, chairman of the House Committee on Public Lands. Mrs. A. D. Sharon, the representative of the Club, was in Washington, interviewed President McKinley and Senators and Representatives in furtherance of the Club's resolutions. Petitions containing over 150,000 signatures, representing all parts of the State were forwarded to Washington. We go to this length in explaining the part taken by the California Club in this victory, because it is entitled to great credit in the matter, and should not be robbed of that credit by the selfish claims of the journal in question. The work of the ladies was intelligent from a political point of view, and they have earned the thanks of California, at least.

The Divorce Mill in Seattle.

THERE were twenty-one divorces granted in Seattle during February, leading by a neck the number of marriage licenses. Which reminds me that Washington is as easy for divorces as Colorado, or Montana, or Dakota, or any other of those States where the divorce residents form a part of the population. Desertion, non-support, incompatibility of temperament, and the accustomed causes, are on the statute books, and courts are easily disposed. In the February crop, women led as plaintiffs, men asking for freedom in only a very few cases. A suspicious circumstance is the fact that few of the cases were defended. I would not like to charge that collusion is the rule, but this fact looks suspicious. The divorce problem is such a complex and delicate one, and has such intimate dependence upon religious belief, that I hesitate to register an opinion as to whether the easy law of Washington is a blessing or a curse. But an administration of divorce laws in which collusion is winked at is most certainly not a blessing.

Mark Twain and the "Cub" Reporter.

MARK TWAIN is not so popular in the newspaper world as he used to be. The reason therefor is a bit of advice "to a young man about to enter journalism," which he published in a leading magazine, for the good that it might do. It did good, but in an unexpected direction. Reduced to its lowest terms, Mark's advice was about as follows: "Go to the city editor and offer to work for nothing. If he accepts, which he is likely to do, go ahead and do your best, but don't say a word about pay until the editor puts you on salary voluntarily, or until some other paper, noticing your good work, offers you a situation." Old newspaper men hold that every youth who had good marks on his compositions in high school thinks that a great future awaits him in journalism. Therefore, it happened that within a month of the article's publication the newspapers this broad land over witnessed a Cape Nome rush of callow youths, anxious to work for nothing. It lowered the market at once. There was no use of the papers paying for "apprentices," when there were half-a-dozen applicants at nothing a week for every position. It followed, therefore, that beginners were expected to go to work free. And today, unless there is a strong "pull" somewhere, the first step to newspaper work is a few weeks or a few months of unpaid work. Mark Twain is a professional joker; this looks like a little practical joke of his on the country at large.

After all, why not? The young lawyer, after receiving his general education, spends two or three years learning the business without pay. The young physician has the same experience. Perhaps the main reason why a newspaper man has jumped into a salary at once has been the fact that journalism is not yet regarded as a full fledged profession in this country. We are not entirely past the stage when a journalist was only a specialized printer, when Horace Greeley "wouldn't have a college graduate for janitor." In this view, the cutting off of salaries in the lower ranges may be only a paradoxical sign of the elevation of the whole profession. Yet I doubt if this was Mark Twain's idea when he wrote his famous article.

A Short Campaign and a Merry.

THE easy re-election of Mayor Hume in Seattle closed a short and merry campaign, so far as I know, the shortest on record. The parties closed their nominations about one week before March 6, the date of the contest. It may have been the brevity of the campaign, rendering legitimate argument impossible, or it may have been personal spite which caused the mud-slinging; at any rate, more vilification was indulged in during the seven days of the campaign than was ever before crowded into a year of Seattle politics. The issue at stake was a peculiar one, turning upon the old Roman question of amusement for the populace. Mayor Hume, the successful candidate, is a straight Republican and believes in a liberal interpretation of all laws, especially those regulating a good time; Mr. Cotterill, his opponent, is a prohibitionist with a mania for closing everything from saloons to slot-machines. Now, as everyone knows, Seattle is a town of pilgrims and strangers. The two legitimate theatres, two variety theatres and one concert-hall are crowded nightly to the doors. The over-flow seeks amusement in the saloons and gambling-halls. Even then, a large number are left over to crowd the streets all the evening. Mayor Hume's friends asked the pertinent question, "Where will these men go o'nights when the town is shut tight?" If the two sides had limited their campaign to straight argument on prohibition vs. popular amusement, all would have been serene and well, but the abusive language used was anything but a credit to the Queen City.

The Nome Fever Spreads.

JUDGING from the heavy sales of the Wave's Nome edition in the East, and from the fact that both the World and the Journal have issued Nome editions, it is plain that the craze has struck New York. Indeed, the whole country feels it. Apparently, wherever the Wave's special edition went, the pictures were reproduced and the articles copied, a sure sign of great public interest. Seattle expects a bigger rush than that of the Klondike days. Scarcely a ship advertised to sail in the spring has any accommodations left for freight or passengers. All the steamers on the Northwest coasting trade were pressed into the service long ago, and the surplus passengers will have to tempt fate in sailing-vessels. The number of the spring and summer rush is estimated at forty thousand. The advance-guard has already crowded the city to such a degree that rooms are at a premium.

A Dismal Joker.

THERE is a medical student in Seattle who is evidently possessed of a ghastly humor that would do credit to an American savage. He is doubtless attached to one of the hospitals and is given subjects for dissection, as is the custom. Less than two weeks ago a leg was found in a pile of ashes in the southern part of the city. Every effort was made by the police to ascertain if a crime had been committed, but without avail. The matter was allowed to drop, but the student, who had evidently enjoyed the notoriety the papers gave to the find, decided that another sensation was necessary; he placed another leg where it could easily be found and the police were again sent to work. Both limbs had been amputated in a professional manner, so there is no doubt but that a surgeon performed the operation, and this dispels the suspicion that a murder had been committed. The authorities are certain that a medical student is responsible for all their trouble and have redoubled their efforts to capture him. He is shrewd, however, and has managed to keep out of the way. It would be a good thing for the community to place this dismal joker some place where he would have time to reflect and enjoy his alleged jokes.

Growth of Northwestern Flour Trade.

AN example of California's easy-going policy as regards commercial development is the spread of the Pacific flour-trade in the Northwest. Flour is the Golden State's chief commercial product and the United States' chief export to the Orient. A few years ago, every pound of this breadstuff exported went through San Francisco. Then the Northwest woke up and began to develop the Chinese trade in this and other products. As a result, Puget Sound and Portland exceeded all the ports of California by $821,000 in 1898 and $542,000 in the first three-quarters of last year. Almost all the flour imported from the Northwest comes from Oregon and Washington, neither California nor that section doing much business, as yet, in exporting the breadstuffs of the interior. The strides made by the Northwest are the more remarkable in that the Chinese and Japanese, being natural conservatives, are never disposed to make changes in the direction of their purchases, preferring to deal with the firms to which they are accustomed. It is claimed by the Northern exporters that California firms, in order to meet this competition, have lowered the quality of their goods while keeping up the price. In Japan, the field is now almost clear for the Northwesterners, who send about 90 per cent of all the flour imported by the Japanese.

The Mechanics' Library.

CONDITIONS over which it had no control have relieved the Mechanics' Institute of its role of showman and compelled it to enter the library business on a large scale. Thus far the library end of the institution has been subsidiary to the Mechanics' Pavilion and the Folsom street lot. In future the Institute must derive the greater part of its income and its raison d'Etre from its books. The organization has just held an election and is manned with a new corps of trustees, to whom several problems of importance will soon be presented. Chief among them will be to find some intelligent disposition for the Mechanics' Pavilion, which under present conditions is run at a loss. The proper housing of the library and the absorption of the Mercantile Library have to be considered in due course. It is about time a handsome library structure was erected provided with a large auditorium available for important concerts and public balls. Such a building, located within reasonable distance of the retail business section of San Francisco, would confer importance on the Institute and materially enrich it.

SPION KOP.

THE OPERATION BY WHICH THE POSITION WAS CAPTURED.

THE most spectacular episode of the war in South Africa was the capture of Spion Kop by the British. It was during Buller's second attempt to relieve Ladysmith and grew out of the failure of the attack on the main line of Boer defense. We are told that the plan of the attempt had been most carefully thought out, and, from a military point of view, was of exceptional interest. It was boldly developed and earnestly pushed, but the task was too great. From the operations of the last few months one military truism has been evolved—an entrenched force armed with modern small arms is invincible against frontal attack made in the open. But the science of war has also changed, and it is a change that robs fighting of all its fascination, which minimizes valor and substitutes the cool, silent brain work of a good chess player for the charge of a light brigade. Says one of the correspondents:

"We began by fighting in a hurry; we are now fighting at leisure. Neither the generals, the men, nor the public at home had formed an approximately correct estimate of the difficulties which had to be overcome, or of the enemy we were to encounter. The Boer fights with his head, seldom with his muscles; our men fight with their muscles, seldom with their head. You cannot get either the officers or the men to understand that the first duty of a soldier is to kill, not to be killed. They have all come out here determined to earn the Victoria Cross, or to distinguish themselves by displaying conspicuous bravery in the field. It is magnificent, but it is not war."

Such a desperate operation as the attack on Spion Kop was inspired by this superb recklessness. There had come a deadlock. The British had fought to the main line of Boer entrenchments and could go no further. Buller advocated retreat across the Tugela, but his subordinates asked to be allowed to take the hill which they believed dominated the entire Boer position. The Standard correspondent thus describes the ascent:

The night was intensely dark. The troops were led by the guides over rocky ridges and through dongas, the men being warned to make as little noise as possible, so as not to attract the attention of the Boers posted on the mountain that towered above. To the west the fitful crack of rifle fire showed that the enemy there was sniping at our infantry on the left front.

Led by General Woodgate and Colonel Bloomfield, the Fusiliers began the arduous ascent. Slowly but steadily pressing on, in single file, the Fusiliers leading, the long line of silent figures crept up the height. Ledge after ledge was passed in silence, the orders being that no shots were to be fired. The work before them was to be done with the bayonet. Colonel Thorneycroft now pressed to the front and led the way. The crest of the mountain, fully two thousand feet above its base, was reached about 3:30 o'clock in the morning of Wednesday, January 24. Far below could be seen the lights of the field hospitals dotted on the plain. The night signals on Three Tree Hill hung like an arc of light in the near distance, and told that all was well.

The crest having been gained, the leading files of Thorneycroft's Mounted Infantry and the Fusiliers advanced along the plateau. Bayonets were now fixed, and the men peered intently through the blackness ahead. Suddenly, at 4 o'clock in the morning, when a third of the entire length of the plateau had been cautiously traversed, a Kaffir was heard singing out the alarm in Dutch. A sentry challenged, and the Fusiliers, levelling bayonets, charged with a cheer. An officer bayoneted the sentry. The Boers thereupon clutched their weapons, fired a wild volley and bolted into the darkness beyond.

The first trench had been won without the loss of a man on our side, and the column sent up a ringing cheer that pealed like a bell through the misty morning.

About 5 a. m. the second trench was taken. Here the troops silently awaited the grim work before them.

About 8 o'clock the misty cloud cap over Spion Kop melted away sufficiently to enable the Boers, who were now crowding in thousands on the ridge and in hundreds behind the rocks and in the trenches across the northern extremity, as well as nearly up to the center of the mountain crest, to open a concentrated fire on our devoted battalions. The hail-like rattle of the Boer rifle was vigorously replied to. General Woodgate, who was detailed by General Warren to effect the capture of the position, walked to and fro amid the never ceasing whistle of flying bullets to direct his men. No one seems to know precisely when the gallant officer was hit, there being no breathing space allowed to look at watches; but early in the engagement the General was shot over the left eye as he was coolly watching the effect of our fire. He was carried to the rear suffering acute pain, but exclaiming, "Let me alone! Let me alone!"

Of the fierce fighting that followed all that day on Spion Kop there are many brilliant accounts, but none more so than that of Winston Churchill, who writes as follows:

"The troops were driven almost entirely off the main plateau and the Boers succeeded in reoccupying some of their trenches. A frightful disaster was narrowly averted. About twenty men in one of the captured trenches abandoned their resistance, threw up their hands and called out that they would surrender. Colonel Thorneycroft, whose great stature made him everywhere conspicuous and who was from dawn till dusk in the first firing line, rushed to the spot. The Boers, advancing to take the prisoners—as at Nicholson Nek—were scarcely thirty yards away. Thorneycroft shouted to the Boer leader: 'You may go to hell! I command on this hill and allow no surrender. Go on with your firing;' which later they did, with terrible effect, killing many. The survivors, with the rest of the firing line, fled two hundred yards, were rallied by their indomitable commander, and, being reinforced by two brave companies of the Middlesex Regiment, charged back, recovering all lost ground, and the position was maintained until nightfall. No words in these days of extravagant expression can do justice to the glorious endurance which the English regiments—for they were all English—displayed throughout the long dragging hours of hellfire.

"A village of ambulance wagons grew up at the foot of the mountain. The dead and injured, smashed and broken by the shells, littered the summit till it was a bloody, reeking shamble. Thirst tormented the soldier, for, though water was at hand, the fight was too close and furious to give even a moment's breathing space. But nothing could weaken the stubborn vigor of the defence.

"The artillery, unable to find or reach the enemy's guns, could only tear up the ground in impotent fury. Night closed in with the British still in possession of the hill."

Describing his endeavor to get up the hill, Mr. Churchill says:

"Streams of wounded met us and obstructed the path. Corpses lay here and there. Many of the wounds were of a horrible nature. The splinters and fragments of the shells had torn and mutilated in the most ghastly manner. I passed about two hundred while I was climbing up. There was, moreover, a small but steady leakage of unwounded men of all corps. Some of these cursed and swore. Others were utterly exhausted and fell on the hillside in stupor. Others again seemed drunk, though they had had no liquor. Scores were sleeping heavily. Fighting was still proceeding, and stray bullets struck all over the ground, while the Maxim shell guns scourged the flanks of the hill and the sheltering infantry at regular intervals of a minute.

Later that night an informal council of war was called and Sir Charler Warren from below the hill sent Mr. Churchill to ascertain Colonel Thorneycroft's view. When the correspondent reached the crest he found "only one solid battalion remained—the Dorsets. All others were intermingled." The writer continues:

"Amid this disorganized but determined force I found Col. Thorneycroft at the top of the mountain. Every one seemed to know, even in the confusion, where he was. He was sitting on the ground surrounded by the remnants of the regiment he had raised, who had fought for him like lions and followed him like dogs. I explained the situation as I had been told and as I thought. Naval guns were prepared to try, sappers and working parties were already on th[illegible] with thousands of sandbags. What did he think? B[illegible] decision had already been taken. He had never rec[illegible] any message from the General, had not had time to write any. Messages had been sent him, and he wanted to send others himself. The fight had been too hot, too close, too interlaced, for him to attend to anything but to support this company, clear those rocks or line that trench. So, having heard nothing and expecting no guns, he had decided to retire. As he put it tersely: 'Better six good battalions safely down the hill than a mop-up in the morning.'" of Wales, who had just entered and was almost bowing.

WRANGLERS.

It is uncommon for a senior wrangler to make his mark in later life. The same thing has been observed of valedictorians at Yale and Harvard. Having reduced themselves to studying-machines, they "strike twelve and stop." Only Lord Rayleigh, already mentioned as Strutt of Trinity, Cayley, the famous professor of mathematics, Lord Kelvin (Sir William Thompson) and Stokes, formerly president of the Royal Society, out of all the senior wranglers in the last sixty-six years, have attained what might be called world-wide celebrity. It is notorious that to find great names on the tripos list one must look through the bunch from the second wrangler to the tenth or twelfth. Thus, in 1854, when Routh, afterward the famous coach, was senior, Clark Maxwell was second. Tait and Steele were respectively senior and second in 1852, and afterward became famous for their joint work, Dynamics of a Particle, of which by far the more brilliant share was commonly attributed to Steele. The famous Colenso, afterward the unorthodox Bishop of Natal, was second in 1836. De Morgan, one of the greatest names in the history of the century's progress in pure mathematics, was fourth wrangler in 1827, and Sylvester, who shared with Stokes until a few years ago the highest place among contemporary English mathematicians, was a second in 1837.

The origin of the term deserves mention. "Wrangler" is named from the debates formerly held by candidates for the honor. "Tripos," as a name for the examination, comes from the three-legged stool, built after the fashion of a tripod, upon which the examining professor used to sit. In former times, that worthy used to joke and bully the candidates, and tutors were appointed to see that he did not go too far. Hence the term "moderator." AMOS SHELDON.

SILK CULTURE IN SAN DIEGO.

THE subject of silk culture in California is one that has not had much attention of late years. Time was when it was a fad of no mean proportions. Then the dailies and weeklies had space for the silk worm as one of our future industries. Almost any agricultural editor could make a vision of busy looms spinning the precious fibre. Lyons was to be a mere village in comparison, and as for Spitalfields, why, it was not to be mentioned in the same breath.

In San Diego lives a lady, Mrs. Carrie Williams, who is persuaded that the climate of the southern extremity of California was especially created for the production of silk. It is dry and equable and in it both the worm and the mulberry tree flourish. In France and Italy the length of the season for silk producing is but seven weeks. In San Diego it is eight months. At her miniature silk works she will show you worms in every one of the five stages, a condition attributable also to the atmosphere, and worms that have attained a length of four inches in twenty-four days, which is phenomenal. She raises three different types of spinners—green, white and yellow. On exhibition are cocoons and reeled silk of each shade. She will show you silk reeled only thirty-one days from the mulberry leaves and declares it possible, if she had the facilities, to spin a silk fabric which would not be older than sixty days, which sounds very wonderful to the expert.

There is ever a market for good silk. We import a good deal from China and Japan. Might this not be another great industrial opportunity like beet sugar culture in California and linen culture in Oregon? Where would the beet have been but for Claus Spreckels? Doubtless silk culture requires its pioneer. But he must be a millionaire.

WAR TALK.

BOER VS. BRITISH ROUND THE BULLETIN BOARDS.

DURING the exciting times when the Boer war hung in the balance, all unemployed San Francisco and a good portion which ought to have been employed, stood on the curbstones before the newspaper offices, watching for news and debating the question. The debates waxed so strong at times that the police had to come in to quell the ensuing riots. The Scotch and English, of course, took the British side, the French and Germans sided with the Boers, while the Irish and Americans were divided. When two Irishmen got together on different sides of the question, the fur flew. Following are a few snap-shots at these curbstone debates. These are not embellished in any way; they are set down just as they occurred.

Extract from an editorial written just back of one of those bulletin boards:

In this matter, as in all other matters, the judgment of the American people may be trusted. Next to free education, free discussion of public questions is the great safe-guard of our liberties. The shrewd business sense of the untrained but efficient common man, as he reasons out for himself in market or office or shop, the public questions of the day, is, after all, the best guide for any earnest and conscientious statesman. Therefore, if it is true, as many assert, that the great majority of the American people are on the side of the Boers, it means that the Boers are in the right, because, in a free commonwealth, where discussion of public questions is not hampered, the majority is always right.

"Shell-dodging," as practiced at Mafeking and other places in South Africa is something of an art. It is seldom possible to see a shell while in flight. To dodge a projectile therefore, one must watch the gunners. When they step away from the piece they are about to fire, it is time to hunt cover.

MRS. ARTHUR BARENDT, as the Duchess of Devonshire. Thors.

Babblings of a Belle.

LENT, dear Diary, is well upon us now, and we whisper to each other that it is a great relief. You see, Diary dear, before Lent we all led ostentatious livess, now we are leading lives of just as much fun, but we do not talk of the dinner or luncheon to which we are going. In fact, we do not have things in the same elaborate way. I have been to small luncheons each day this last week. The invitations have been over the telephone, no really elaborately arranged table. Just a few roses in a glass bowl in the center, and a nice old chat. Most of us have sworn off candy and saying mean things of one another, so, to a certain extent, the girls are not quite so much fun. However, one always feels infinitely better when one has not gossiped. At least I do, and I do not believe I am any more of a prig than any of the others. A great many of the girls are being quite religious. They go to church every afternoon and sing hymns, and then talk golf or of their spring bonnets all the way home. I have not been very pious this last week, as I am musically inclined, and have been most interested in those Wagner lectures at the California Theatre. Uncle Frank gave Mr. Bispham letters to papa, so we have become quite friendly. He has the most winning ways, and has told us much about the musical people in London. I like the way Mr. Damrosch lectures, but Aunt Sybil becomes very angry. She says she does not mind the explanation of the different themes, but the stories of these operas, with all of which even frivolous Cricket is familiar, are absolutely ridiculous. I also like his facetiousness. Aunt Sybil says he has not the dignity of a real lecturer, but I put it down to a sort of personal feeling he has for the different roles. I think it about the same thing as a young man coming to call on a girl. After discussing the weather topic, the latest book, about which neither the fellow nor you care a straw, how long the "Old Homestead" has been playing—and numerous other things—he begins telling you some of the things that have happened to him. Most of these interesting items are adapted from stories one finds in the weekly papers, but making them personal enhances their value, and after a bit one forgets that one has previously read them; and before the evening is over one has come to the conclusion that Mr. So-and-so is a very versatile fellow, and quite worth cultivating. Mr. Bispham has, he told us, a musical every Saturday night during the season at his house in London. If the opera be going on, those who take part come in afterwards, and one is sure to meet someone there who is decidedly worth while. Everyone introduces everyone else, so things are made particularly easy for the host and hostess. Mama called on Madame Gadski, and they all have lunched quite informally with us. Mr. Damrosch has quite won me, he is so quick and amusing, and to hear Mr. Bispham and him say witty things to each other is quite the most humorous thing I have ever heard. Madame Gadski is rather nice-looking off the stage, and has a sweet manner. They must have a capital time travelling together, and Arthur, lucky boy, is going East when they do, just for the trip. Mr. Bispham told us that there would be no real season this year in London owing to great losses the British have sustained in their extermination of the Boers. The Queen will hold no drawing-room, and a general quiet prevaileth everywhere. It is awfully hard, I think, on the British maidens who expected to be presented. Still, it is no use abusing the inevitable.

Speaking of inevitables reminds me of my "Ideal Lover." He is here with me again, and I am to be married on the 30th of April. I wanted to take all chances on ill-luck and be a May Day bride, but papa and mama say no, it must be in April. We shall live quietly at the Palace Hotel, and papa, mama and Leila will go to Europe. Aunt Sybil goes to Buenos Ayres for a trip; she has always wanted to see South America, and as she owns some stock in the telephone company there, that is excuse enough. I believe that they are having as much trouble there with their telephone stock, as we are in San Francisco with our gas and water.

I suppose you are very much interested, Diary dear, in the return of my "Ideal." Well, after spending a few days in New York, he came to the conclusion that he and I were not children, so he quietly returned, bringing me a superb ruby ring, and we told papa we loved each other, and if we were not to marry with his consent—well, we were both of age. What could papa say? I am having a most elaborate trousseau made, and have found a girl exactly my size and figure, so I do not have to have a single one of my garments fitted. She is doing this for a consideration, and it is saving me from the most disagreeable, I think, of all ordeals. I spend all my days with the "Ideal." We take long walks in the morning, generally going to the links, for he loves to watch the girls playing. A great many get there about nine o'clock, and put in most of their time there. Almost every day one can see the Morgan girls, Edith McBean, Caro Crockett, Sara Drum, Mary Scott and Maud Mullins working hard at "lofting," or "putting," or "driving," or just going around the links. I gather wild flowers. I never saw the flowers in greater profusion than they are this year. There are spots here and there where one can pick quantities of wild violets, and pansies and blue bells. Then, again, there are seas of buttercups, which are, after all, the prettiest wild flowers of all. The eschscholtzias are not at their brightest yet. Is not it a delightful existence to have links so beautifully situated, and nothing to do but play golf all day long. A curious thing I have noticed. Each girl I know has given up something she liked in Lent, but not one has refrained from playing golf. That, one of the "golf fiends" told me, was too much like giving up her own individuality. We all are sewing for the poor. We always do a certain amount of that in Lent, though I do not think the sewing circles have been so well attended by girls as they have been other years. A number of us also belong to the Children's Hospital Auxiliary, and go out there very much more frequently than we did before Lent. We read to the children and try to amuse them generally, and really, to see the pleasure one brings into a ward makes one enjoy the time one spends there. Poor little youngsters, one cannot help wondering what future lies before each of them.

MISS MAREN FOELICH.

The most interesting event of the week has been the unexpected, to most people, marriage of Dr. Philip King Brown and Helen Hillyer. Nellie is bright, jolly, and very good-looking. She has travelled all the world over and spent several winters in Washington. One of her most delightful trips was when Ella Goodall of Oakland and she took a trip up the Nile together. They met with all sorts of delightful and not one unpleasant adventure, and met some most interesting people. Dr. Brown we all know; he has grown up with us, and each of us has lost her heart to him and we hope he to us, many, many times in our lives. The doctors say he has a brilliant career before him. So, Diary dear, I leave it to you which of the two is to be congratulated. Mama says both. I say Nellie, and Lila says decidedly Doctor Brown. They were married in Mrs. Hearst's rooms in the Hearst Building, no one being present but their immediate relations.

Another engagement of which I have to tell you is of Mary Harrison, daughter of William Greer Harrison of this city, to Mr. Thornhill a Belfast barrister, who is very well equipped in the good things of this world. Mrs. Harrison and her daughters left here a few years ago for a European trip, and while in Belfast Mary met Mr. Thornhill. They will be married in July. I am sorry Mary is to live over there, for she is a very nice girl, and I believe she can count among her many accomplishments that of being as good a cook as the late Dan O'Connell. There are not many girls of whom that could be said.

Now, Diary dear, I think I have told you all I know for this week.

MISS CRICKET.

MISS JOAN HADENFELDT,

Though the Mardi Gras is past and gone now and fading into the memories of the participants, the reproduction of some of its figures may not be out of place. In fact the publication of a pretty woman's portrait is never amiss—provided the facilities of the publishers are such as to do the subject justice. I am aware that the dailies have printed the outlines of the Queen of the Carnival, but however ambitious, the newspaper half-tone is etter as an indication than as an achievement. Its highest function is to suggest the original—whereas the half-tone produced on heavy paper and with fine presswork is but a shade paler than the original photograph.

As Queen of the occasion Miss Hadenfeldt made a striking figure—oriental in garb and adornments as the portrait indicates, and with the carriage and air appropriate to the occasion. Mrs. Arthur Barendt, whose portrait is also here, was a faithful representation in so far as costume of Sir Joshua Reynolds' Duchess of Devonshire. The bodice and panniers were of pink brocaded silk, the skirt of pink satin. With these was the usual black-plumed Gainsborough hat and the regulation white wig.

The engagement of Clara Everett Wall of this city to Mr. David Rochel Warden of Pittsburg has been announced. Miss Wall is the daughter of Captain Mayo Wall, vice-president of the Hibernia Bank, and a well-known and highly-respected business man of this city. Miss Wall is a very handsome and exceedingly bright and fascinating society girl, with a large circle of friends. She is an elegant dresser and the personification of grace.

Many expressions of regret have been heard at the untimely death of D. N. Walter, the head of the pioneer carpet firm of San Francisco. Mr. Walter was an excellent citizen and a good man. He was also a first rate business man. A native of Reckendorff in Germany, he was brought to America as a child, spent his earli r years in New York and came to San Francisco in 1851. Keen, shrewd and industrious, he soon got into business for himself and it is not surprising that he succeeded. His firm gained supremacy in its line and has maintained its position against all rivalry for close on half a century.

Mr. Walter was a good representative of the best type of Jewish financier. Intensely conservative, he confined himself to strictly legitimate investments, but within his limits no one was keener or quicker of judgment. In the matter of stocks and bonds he seldom erred and his fortune could doubtless be converted into cash at an hour's notice. In the board meetings of the Nevada National and German Savings Banks, of which he was director, his opinion and foresight were highly considered; he was generally on the right side of any enterprise that happened to be discussed, in fact, might always, in any construction, be counted upon for the common sense view. In his private life he was kindly shrewd and practical. While not in any sense a scholar he was widely read and there were few subjects of current interest that he could not talk intelligently and informatively about. He had no fads in particular, but was very fond of reading and spent his leisure hours in his library.

Mr. Walter leaves a large family connection to mourn his loss.

WASHINGTON. A DIPLOMATIC WEDDING

LONDON. MARRIAGES IN SOCIETY

SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE OF THE WAVE.

IT is rare that Washington correspondents have to go out of their way to describe a wedding. Most social functions in the capital are reported not with an eye to the social importance of the parties involved, but to their political position, and descriptions of balls or dinners or christenings give the minimum space to what people wore and how the place was decorated and the maximum to an account of who they were and how they got to be that way. But we have had a wedding this week which had no direct connection with American politics, the two thereby joined together coming from far away, and of distinctive social importance. Wherefore we have been as fish out of water, in our dealing with unfamiliar things.

The most striking feature of the wedding of the Hon. Lillian Pauncefote, youngest daughter of the British minister, to the Hon. Robert Bromley, was the observance of several customs entirely English and never observed at our own weddings. The use of a train-bearer was one of these—although I am told by a member of that sex which takes delight in weddings that Americans are copying this innovation. Then the ushers, who, in all the American weddings I have witnessed, "line up" with the bridesmaids before the altar, withdrew from sight when the congregation was seated. Also, the bride led the procession, instead of bringing up the rear, and a betrothal ceremony preceded the regular and formal marriage. During this preliminary, the couple stood in the chancel, advancing up to the altar for the marriage ceremony proper.

Besides this, in the conduct of the bride there was a charming difference from that observed by our brides. Ours have a way, I believe, of marching formally down the aisle, with eyes cast down and a blushing demeanor, real or assumed, but the Hon. Lillian Pauncefote, like a loyal maid and true, went straight to her family in the front pews and embraced them, one by one, after which the procession went on. All these things gave it a strange air, which, my lady informant tells me, was heightened by the certainty that the clothes were made in England. Myself, I noticed nothing strange in their fit, but I am of the misunderstanding sex.

Never did old St. John's church see such a crowd as assembled, inside and out, to witness this ceremony. There were eight hundred guests, just taxing the capacity of the edifice, but Lord and Lady Pauncefote had done wisely in limiting the invitations to that capacity and in numbering seats and cards of admission to correspond. Outside, the crowd far surpassed in numbers the invited guests. It was mostly a white wedding, and the altar and chancel were decorated in Easter lilies and palms.

When the bride came, she was like a veiled head in a mass of white. The gown seemed to extend from her on every side and to fall far, far behind her to the little white page who held it. As she stood before the altar, this train extended the whole width of the chancel and fell, a billowy, cloudy mass, into the aisle. There was very much train and very little bride visible, but the head that peeped out from this splendor showed a beauty of its own sort, the light, pure beauty of a high class English girl. The actual ceremony of a wedding is mightily short and slight, even when it is padded out by "Lohengrin" at the start and Mendelssohn at the end, and there was nothing notable about this one except the double betrothal mentioned before.

I am not an expert on gowns, but the same lady who gave me points on the difference between English and American customs at weddings has also favored me with an account of the dresses worn at this one. The bridal costume—she says—was of rich, white satin. The long train hung from the shoulders. Down the seams of the skirt a wide passementerie ran in loops and rings of large seed pearl, efflorescing about a foot from the edge in a Van Dyke of Honiton lace, caught up with a spray of orange blossoms, one fine cluster of which ornamented the deep point of the lace immediately in front of the skirt. The court train was edged with a cascade of Honiton lace in Van Dykes, caught with orange blossoms, a large cluster of which, catching up an especially full, rich fall of the lace, marked the middle of the edge. The tiny loops and rings of seed pearls ran in and out of this elegance of lace and blossoms. Across the bust, the satin was arranged with a rich fulness, caught up to a narrow point immediately in the middle with a cluster of orange blossoms fastened with a chou of satin, over which was a fall of the Honiton lace from the yoke which, like the sleeves, was of fine chiffon. Her chief ornament was a necklace of five rows of diamonds, the gift of the bridegroom's mother. This ornament has a history. For many generations this has been a present to every bride marrying into the Bromley family, each matron passing it on to the next bride. She carried lilies of the valley.

The bridesmaids, I learned from the same reliable authority, were dressed in turquoise blue Roman satin brocaded with horizontal effect of seed pearls in the same color, arranged in wavy lines. There were four of these attendants—the two sisters of the bride, Miss Curzon of England, and Miss Sargent of Boston.

NETTA DYKE.

London,

WHAT are American women doing with their waists this season? Are they going back to the wasp shape? Are they letting them out on the Delsarte plan? I wish to know, because London has just undergone a great change in this respect, and I am vitally interested. I discovered this at the wedding of the week and the season, that of young Lord Chesterfield to Miss Enid Wilson, of whom every American must have heard as one of the greatest beauties in England. The time was when Miss Wilson, now Lady Chesterfield, showed a waist like an hour-glass. But last Thursday, at her marriage, the line was of very "sensible" proportions, while every one of the bridesmaids had plenty of breathing-room beneath her corsage. I am told by modistes that this is more than the fancy of one bride, that it is the forerunner of an entire change in fashion in this respect. The latest bodices are made only "half-fitting," or loose on the figure. It is a style that taxes severely the ingenuity of the modiste. To set a bodice close and tight to a wasp-shaped figure required only skill in fitting; to make a loose bodice look well upon a waist of natural proportions calls for artistic work in designing.

The change is an inconsistent one. As I have already written you, all the other late innovations in London are away from nature. Women are "making up" with absolute frankness. They have taken again to the earrings of the 1870 period. More than this, there has been a return, quite less pronounced, to the formal and affected manners of the age of haircloth furniture. The stalwart Diana, with her walks, her golf, her love of out-of-door sports, is not quite good form now. And yet, here we go, back toward natural waists. "Sister, 'tis an inconsistent sex, thine and mine."

To take example from the same wedding. Seven out of the twelve bridesmaids were made up, more or less. I watched them very closely, because I've had my eye out for that sort of thing lately. Five of them were decorated as to the ears. All were prim and precise in manner, with a "prunes, pears and prisms" air. If the bride herself wore no jewels and displayed no paint, it was without doubt because brides are supposed to ornament themselves simply, and because Miss Wilson has a natural complexion far beyond art.

It was a stiff, British wedding, chilling near at hand, but beautiful as a spectacle. The tall, blonde bride was gowned in white crepe de Chine, with a heavy train of thick, white satin, trimmed with ermine. It showed how far the idea of fur trimming has gone this season. It began with a modest display on street dresses, then it invaded the domain of the ball gown, and now it has come to decorate a bridal costume. I never took kindly, never shall take kindly, to fur as a trimming for indoor dresses. It is too far removed from its natural place and from its reason for being. Besides that, silks and satins have no business next to the raw hide of an animal. It always strikes me as does a flannel shirt and a tall hat.

This is a digression. Let us return. The twelve bridesmaids were in white cloth, with smart, tight-fitting red cloth coats and red felt hats. It happened that several of them were striking brunettes, so that the high color fitted them well. It also explained, I think, the already-mentioned freedom of make-up. They carried sable muffs, the bridegroom's present to them. The presents at this wedding are said to have been the richest and most magnificent of any fashionable wedding, outside of Jewish circles, for many years. One of them was a house—No. 5 Grosvenor Gardens. Lord Chesterfield gave the bride a fine diamond tiara, and a beautiful emerald necklace was the gift of her mother, Mrs. Wilson.

Lady Chesterfield was a beautiful bride, but Lady Castelreagh, who became a matron and a peeress last week, was a more charmingly human one. Her wedding was quite simple, and as little stiff as was consistent with a ceremony supposed to be so solemn as the "joining together in holy matrimony." Lady Castlereagh is just coming out of half-mourning, and her clothes were very quiet in tone and tint. One gown in her trousseau is worthy of special mention. What to call it I do not know; it is in a class by itself, being a mixture of princesse robe, pelisse, tea-gown and redingote, partaking of the nature of each and all of them. It is of fine, black cloth, with a deep collar of point de Venise, the lace continuing in one loose, graceful end down the skirt. This collar is edged with mink. There is not a bone in the dress, yet it fits like a glove.

Another of this trousseau's innovations, which is already being copied in London, was a cloth evening dress. This one, because of the light tones exacted by half-mourning, was of tender mauve. The cloth, in the bolt, resembled a heavy and handsome table-cloth, embroidered in ribbon of its own color. It was made up so as to wrap loosely around the figure, the inevitable opening at the left side showing a peep of lace. Another garmene worthy of notice was a set of shirt bodice mingling all the very newest ideas. They were of thick, faille silk, simply cut in thres wide plaits, and studded all over with buttont of different sizes. The black waists showed diamante and turquoise buttons, and the pale yellow, carbuncles. With these waists, large lace bows with long ends are worn. One of the novelties in bows was silk embroidery on net.

WAR ON THE SLUM.

STORY OF THE CAMPAIGN OF TENEMENT REFORM IN NEW YORK

IT is now ten years since Jacob A. Riis published the book that won him fame. That early study of New York tenement life, How the Other Half Lives, attracted the attention of sociologists everywhere; and nowhere more than in New York itself. Mr. Riis had been a newspaper reporter for many years. He had come to know the people of the East Side, where they lived, how they lived, and why they lived that way, in the course of his daily experiences on the Mulberry Bend detail. Since then he has been in the forefront of the citizens' reform movement. His papers and sympathetic sketches in the magazines of the life he knows so well are familiar to all. His latest book, A Ten Years' War, is an account of what has been done in New York for the slums by intelligent and tireless endeavor.

The problem of the East Side today is centered about the Jews and Italians. Mr. Riis is an optimist. He believes that industrially and politically these aliens are becoming Americanized. The compulsory school law, playgrounds to keep the children off the street, the demolition of the unsanitary tenement barracks, the creation of parks in the congested districts—all these are having their influence upon the population. But the process is a slow one. "Would I shut out the newcomers? Sometimes," he says, "looking at it from the point of view of the Barge Office and the sweat shop, I think I would." But he adds:

A Contrast.

"Then there comes up the recollection of a picture of the city of Prague that hangs in a Bohemian friend's parlor, here in New York. I stood looking at it one day, and noticed in the foreground cannon that pointed in over the city. I spoke of it, unthinking, and said to my host that they should be trained, if against an enemy, the other way. The man's eye flashed fire. 'Ha!' he cried, 'here, yes!' When I think of that, I do not want to shut the door.

"Again, there occurs to me an experience the police had last summer in Mulberry street. They were looking for a murderer, and came upon a nest of Italian thugs who lived by blackmailing their countrymen. They were curious about them, and sent their names to Naples with a request for information. There came back such a record as none of the detectives had ever seen or heard before. All of them were notorious criminals, who had been charged with every conceivable crime, from burglary to kidnapping and 'maiming,' and some not to be conceived of by the American mind. Five of them together had been sixty-three times in jail, and one no less than twenty-one times. Yet, though they are all 'under special surveillance,' they had come here without let or hindrance within a year. When I recall that, I want to shut the door quick. I sent the exhibit to Washington at the time."

The East Side is the great Tammany stronghold, and not without reason. The alien speedily discovers that it pays to stand in with the boss. Whatever else he neglects, he never neglects to vote:

The Italian Citizen.

"Our Italian is not dull. With his intense admiration for the land where a dollar a day waits upon the man with a shovel, he can see no reason why he should not accept the whole 'American plan' with ready enthusiasm. It is a good plan. To him it sums itself up in the statement: a dollar a day for the shovel; two dollars for the shovel with a citizen behind it. And he takes the papers and the two dollars. He came here for a chance to live. Of politics, social ethics, he knows nothing. Government in his old home existed for his oppression. Why should he not attach himself with his whole loyal soul to the plan of government in his new home that offers to boost him into the place of his wildest ambition, 'a job on the streets'—that is, in the Street Cleaning Department—and asks no other return than that he shall vote as directed? Vote! Not only he, but his cousins and his brothers and uncles will vote as they are told, and get Pietro the job he covets. If it pleases the other man, what is it to him for whom he votes? He is after the job. Here, ready-made to the hand of the politician, is such material as he never saw before. For Pietro's loyalty is great. As a police detective, one of his own people, once put it to me: 'He got a kind of an idea, or an old rule: an eye for an eye; do to another as you'd be done by; if he don't squeal on you, you stick by him, no matter what the consequences.' This 'kind of an idea' is all he has to draw upon for an answer to the question if the thing is right. But the question does not arise. Why should it? Was he not told by the agitator whom the police jailed at home that in a republic all men are made happy by means of the vote? And is there not proof of it? It has made him happy, has it not? And the man who bought his vote seems to like it. Well, then? With his vote he could buy what seemed to him wealth. When citizen papers were offered him for $12.50, he bought them quickly, and got his job on the street."

And yet these people have ethical standards, and discriminate between right and wrong—sometimes. Very queer discriminations they are, too—sometimes. We have this interesting instance of an uneasy conscience:

"When an East Side midnight burglar, discovered and pursued, killed a tenant who blocked his way of escape a few weeks ago, his 'girl' gave him up to the police. But it was not because he had taken human life. 'He was good to me,' she explained to the captain whom she told where to find him, 'but since he robbed the church I had no use for him.' He had stolen, it seems, the communion service in a Staten Island church. The thoughtless laughed. But in her ignorant way she was only trying to apply the standards of morality as they had been taught her. Stunted, bemuddled, as they were, I think I should prefer to take my chances with her rather than with the woman of wealth and luxury who, some years ago, gave a Christmas party to her lap-dog, as on the whole the sounder of the two, and by far the more hopeful."

Practical Reform.

Mr. Riis describes Colonel Waring's work as the genesis of practical reform in New York:

"It was Colonel Waring's broom that first let light into the slum. That which had come to be considered an impossible task he did by the simple formula of 'putting a man instead of a voter behind every broom.' The words are his own. The man, from a political dummy who loathed his job and himself in it with cause, became a self-respecting citizen, and the streets that were dirty were swept. The ash barrels that had befouled the sidewalks disappeared, almost without any one knowing it until they were gone. The trucks that obstructed the children's only playground, the street, went with the dirt despite the opposition of the truckman who had traded off his vote to Tammany in the past for stall room at the curbstone. They did not go without a struggle. When appeal to the alderman proved useless, the truckman resorted to strategy. He took a wheel off, or kept a perishing nag, that could not walk, hitched to the truck over night to make it appear that it was there for business. But subterfuge availed as little as resistance. In the Mulberry Bend he made his last stand. The old houses had been torn down, leaving a three-acre lot full of dirt mounds and cellar holes. Into this the truckmen of the Sixth Ward hauled their carts, and defied the street cleaners. They were no longer in their way, and they were on the Park Department's domain, where no Colonel Waring was in control. But while their owners were triumphing, the children playing among the trucks set one of them rolling down into a cellar, and three or four of the little ones were crushed. That was the end. The trucks disappeared."

By far the larger portion of the book is taken up with an account of what has been accomplished by the reform movement during the last few years. Entire blocks of filthy buildings were condemned and torn down. Playpiers were built, gymnasiums constructed, and bath-houses, too, and provision made whereby the new schoolhouses should be made available for continuous use by clubs, lectures, entertainments, night schools and vacation schools, with roof gardens and commodious playgrounds for the children. The famous Committee of Seventy was largely responsible for these enterprises. Says Mr. Riis:

"I was a member of that committee, and I fed fat my grudge against the slum tenement, knowing that I might not again have such a chance. Bone Alley went. Where it stood workmen are today building a gymnasium with baths for the people, and a playground and park which may even be turned into a skating-pond in winter if the architect keeps his promise. A skating-pond for the children of the Eleventh Ward! No wonder the politician is in a hurry to take the credit for what is going forward over there. It is that or nothing with him now. It will be all up with Tammany, once the boys find out that these were the things she withheld from them all the years, for her own gain. Bone Alley brought thirty-seven dollars under the auctioneer's hammer. Thieves' Alley brought only seven dollars, and the old Helvetia House, where Boss Tweed and his gang met at night to plan their plundering raids on the city's treasury, was knocked down for five.

Victory of the Playground.

"The playground is here to wrestle with the gang for the boy, and it will win. It came so quietly that we hardly knew of it till we heard the shouts. It took us seven years to make up our minds to build a play-pier, and it took us just about seven weeks to build it when we got so far; but then we learned more in one day than we had dreamed of in the seven years. Half the East Side swarmed over it with shrieks of delight, and carried the Mayor and the city government, who had come to see the show, fairly off their feet. And now 'we are seven,' or will be when the one in Brooklyn has been built—great handsome structures, seven hundred feet long, some of them, with music every night for mother and the babies, and for papa, who can smoke his pipe there in peace. The moon shines upon the quiet river, and the steamers go by with their lights. The street is far away with its noise. The young people go sparking in all honor, as it is their right to do.

"The play-pier is the kindergarten in the educational campaign against the gang. It gives the little ones a chance. Often enough it is a chance for life. The street as a playground is a heavy contributor to the undertaker's bank account. I kept the police slips of a single day in May two years ago, when four little ones were killed and three crushed under the wheels of trucks in tenement-streets. Today there are half a dozen fully blown playgrounds downtown and uptown where the children swarm. The other day I watched the children at their play in the new Hester street gymnasium. The dusty square was jammed with a mighty multitude. It was not an ideal spot, for it had not rained in weeks, and powdered sand and cinders had taken wing and floated like a pall over the perspiring crowd. But it was heaven to them. A hundred boys and men stood in line, waiting their turn upon the bridge ladder and the traveling rings that hung full of struggling and squirming humanity, groping madly for the next grip. No failure, no rebuff, discouraged them. Seven boys and girls rode with looks of deep concern—it is their way—upon each end of the see-saw, and two squeezed into each of the forty swings that had room for one, while a hundred counted time and saw that none had too much. It is an article of faith with these children that nothing that is going for their benefit is to be missed. It is rather to cry over than to laugh at, if one but understands it. The sight of these little ones swarming over a sand heap until scarcely an inch of it was in sight, and gazing in rapt admiration at the poor show of a dozen geraniums and English ivy plants in pots on the window-sill of the overseer's cottage was pathetic in the extreme."

Nothing succeeds like success. The politicians saw that the people wanted parks and playgrounds, and they made haste to take the credit for what had been done:

"When Mulberry Bend park was finally dedicated to the people's use, they took charge of the celebration with immense unction, and invited themselves to sit in the high seats and glory in the achievement which they had done little but hamper and delay from the first. When they had had their say Colonel Waring arose, and, curtly reminding them that they had really had no hand in the business, proposed three cheers for the citizen effort that struck the slum this staggering blow. There was rather a feeble response from the platform, but rousing cheers from the crowd."

The lessons of A Ten Years' War come home to San Francisco. Many of the problems are identical. We can even add a few of our own. Aside from its sociological value the book is intensely interesting. Published by Houghton, Mifflin & Co.

NEW BOOKS.

The author of the Siren City—which is Naples, and not Pittsburg—has hit upon an ingenious scheme for getting ahead of the inquisitive reader. Instead of printing his first chapter first and his last chapter last, as Wilkie Collins used to do, Mr. Benjamin Swift (author of the alliterative sibilant aforesaid) begins his book with approximately his last chapter and hides his first chapter along towards the middle. Thus the young person who insists upon knowing 'how it is coming out" finds herself, when she consults citerior and ulterior, in a condition of considerable mental perturbation, as if she had been reading in a Chinese directory of names, or a rhyming dictionary, or a Hebrew spelling book, or some other eccentricity of sequences. She will then go to work and read the story. And this is what she will find. A rich young Englishwoman, who elopes with a bogus Italian duke, is mistreated by him and leaves him. The duke soon thereafter dies in jail. A more appreciative lover weds the widow. Just why the book should be called the Siren City is none of my business, I suppose; but it may be because of the "Sunday story" descriptions of rag time life in Naples. We are informed that the author has visited the Carmine Prison. Published by Dodd, Mead & Co., New York.

The series of "Beacon Biographies" (Small, Maynard & Co., Boston) has had added to it the life of Thomas Paine, by Ellery Sedgwick. Thomas Paine, staymaker, sailor, exciseman, school-teacher, tobacconist and controversialist, all before he left England for America in 1774 with Franklin's letter in his pocket, for thirteen years took a most active and useful part in the counsels of the young America. He was employed by Congress as a salaried writer, accompanied Colonel Laurens on a successful mission to get money from France, wrote the "Crisis" papers, held important secretaryships, was influential in urging a stronger union among the States, had official recognition of his services from the New York and Pennsylvania Assemblies, and was presented with $3,000 by Congress only a year or two before he sailed for France. For fifteen years thereafter he was engaged in political and religious controversies in Paris, participating in the French Revolution. He returned to America in 1802, and died seven years later in New York. The literature which has grown up about Paine and his works bears witness to the man. It is almost exclusively controversial. One writer assails; the next defends. His earliest biographers, George Chalmers and James Cheetham, were his bitter enemies; while Mr. Conway's exhaustive biography of 1892 is an able argument for the defense. Mr. Sedgwick now splits the difference. "It is difficult, indeed," he says, "to write of Paine without enthusiasm for his genius and a lively recognition of his great services to liberty. But his faults are set down frankly. The reader shall be judge and jury."

Have You a Piano that You do not Use?

Is the piano in your home a musical instrument, and do you enjoy it as such, or does it remain unused for months at a time and become practically nothing more than an article of furniture.

The Pianola

Is bringing into use thousands of pianos that have been silent for many years.

It is bringing music into homes where it has long been a stranger.

It is making players of people who, lacking musical training, had never expected to experience the pleasure of producing music for themselves.

It is increasing the repertoire of amateur and professional pianists by making the entire literature of the piano instantly available without study and without practice.

The Pianola looks like a small cabinet. It has small felt-covered fingers that rest on the keyes of the piano and, operated by pneumatic power, strike the keys with a pliant, yielding and remarkably sympathetic touch that is almost identical with that of the human fingers.

When not in use the Pianola may be easily detached from the piano and moved to another part of the room.

The Pianola can be used in connection with any Grand or Upright piano, and does not in any way mar or disfigure the instrument. It can be easily and quickly adjusted by any one.

The action of the Pianola is so simple that even a child can readily learn to play it; at the same time it is capable of so much expression that its greatest admirers are those who best understand and appreciate good music.

Price $250 Upward.

The Pianola can be bought by monthly payments. Our instruments are gladly shown to the merely curious as well as to intending purchasers.

SETH HOPKIN'S SNAKES.

"OLD Seth Hopkins always was a crank on the subject of snakes, especially blacksnakes," said Deacon Todgers reminiscently to the crowd at the store. "'A rattler's pizen clear through,' Seth used to say to me, 'but a blacksnake's got intelligence. It's my belief blacksnakes were referred to in the Scriptures, where they make allusion to the wisdom of the serpent. But, of course, I ain't sure; only it seems probable.'

"There was one thing Seth was even a bigger crank about than snakes—that was trying to get some one else to do his work for him. One day last fall Seth went down to the city and while he was there he attended some show where they hypnotized people and made them do all sorts of things, just according to what the professor who did the hypnotizing seemed to want. Well, Seth came back fairly bubbling over with his new idea.

"'It's on the same principle that a blacksnake charms a bird,' he says, describing the show to me. 'Properly applied, there's lots of money in the scheme. Why should I wear out my poor old limbs trudging after woodcock and snipe, when the woods are full of strong, healthy blacksnakes waiting and anxious to use their natural powers of hypnotism for the benefit of a tired but worthy old man?'

"So Seth caught half a dozen extra big blacksnakes and set to work training them—'educating,' he called it. In spite of his fine words about charity to poor snakes, I couldn't reconcile his way of training them to my conscience. For it was nothing more or less than building up a desire for strong drink and making drunkards of those poor misguided creatures. The first thing he did was to mix a little liquor with the food of his snakes by dipping the pieces of meat he gave them in whisky. At first the snakes wouldn't touch the meat, but it was all they could get to eat, so they finally swallowed it. A blacksnake seems to take to whisky pretty naturally, and it was only a few days before Seth's snakes wouldn't look at their m at unless it had a taste of liquor about it. He kept them in a little pen and they soon got to know him. When he came out to feed them the snakes would all hurry over to Seth and crawl around him, and lift up their heads and sort of make a fuss over h m, as if they were telling him what a good fellow he was and how glad they were to see him, and wouldn't he please give them a drink, for all the world like a lot of loafers when an easy thing comes into a barroom.

"'It's an interesting experiment in snake nature and shows that blacksnakes have a human liking for good liquor,' I said to Seth, 'but I don't see where Seth Hopkins is getting birds out of the game.'

"'Don't worry about that, deacon,' says Seth, as complacent as if he were some benefactor of dumb brutes. 'The first thing is to get these snakes of mine anxious for liquor. The next thing will be to teach them that the only way they can get a drink is to turn in a bird.' He knew a blacksnake depended a good deal on charming, or 'hypnotizing,' as he called it, to catch birds, and he acted on this idea in the second part of his task of training the snakes. First he set some traps, and after a good deal of trouble he caught a few live birds. Then he would tie a bird on a pole, where it would be out of the reach of a snake. The string with which the bird was tied prevented it from flying away and at the same time was long enough so that the snake could bring the bird to Seth if charmed so as to fall into his power.

"He waited until his blacksnakes were pretty thirsty, and then, instead of giving them anything that resembled good liquor, he took one of them out where a bird was tied. It was whisky, not woodcock, the snake wanted, and at first the snake would pike right over to where Seth was standing and fairly beg for a drink. Seth would take it back and put it in front of the bird. 'It's a case of no bird, no booze,' Seth used to say.

"'One by one Seth put all six of his snakes through their schooling. But there's just as much difference in the intelligence of snakes as there is of men, and a big blacksnake that Seth called Pete was the first to comprehend what was wanted. Pete realized after a few lessons that every time he charmed a bird and brought it to Seth he had a drink coming. Then Pete wanted to work overtime, but Seth wouldn't let him.

"As soon as he saw Pete understood the game he changed his methods a little. Instead of taking the snakes out separately to their school he brought them out in a bunch with a bird for each. Pete charmed his bird, handed it over to Seth and got a drink. The other snakes came hurrying up for a drink, too, but they didn't come in on that round. It wasn't but a little while before they realized what they must do to get liquor, and then they fairly tumbled over themselves to charm birds and exchange them for drinks. After they had done this about a dozen times Seth judged their education was complete.

"'Valuable time and fatherly care and good whisky I've lavished on these snakes,' says Seth, 'and now they can repay me. Woodcock are scarce and command a good price. But with the aid of my six educated blacksnakes and my own masterly intellect I'm going to flood the market. And I won't stir out of the house to do it.'

"The next day Seth began to gather in his harvest of birds. He kept his snakes locked up until they were mighty anxious for their morning grog. Then he let them out. The snakes, being anxious to catch a bird and get a drink, began to look around in a wondering way. But not a bird was in sight. Then he led the snakes over to the edge of the clearing, they following him like a lot of sheep. He waved his hand in the direction of the woods. For a minute the snakes were clean puzzled. Then they got it through their heads that the birds they were expected to get were in the woods, and that the quicker they got a bird the sooner each thirsty blacksnake would have a drink. And each snake dusted off for the woods.

"Late that afternoon I called around at Seth's house. There he was lying in the hammock and smoking his pipe as calm and peaceable as if he he had nothing to do but draw interest on his money. At one side of the room were six piles of woodcock. There wasn't a pile with less than fifteen birds in it, and one pile had twenty-two. As fast as a snake had brought a bird Seth had given it a drink of whisky for its pay. The pile represented a good deal of whisky, but as woodcock were scarce and bringing a good price and each drink had been a small one, Seth was a long ways ahead of the game.

"'Where's all your snakes?' I asked him.

"Seth looked at me kind of amazed. 'Those trained and intelligent creatures of mine are blacksnakes, deacon, not sewers,' said he. 'Where would any creatures be that drank the amount of whisky represented by those piles of birds? Sleeping it off, of course. All but Pete, dear old Pete. He's several drinks ahead of any of the others, and he's out after a fresh bird now.'

"Just then there was a little rustle at the door, and in came Pete. Did you ever see a drunken blacksnake? Well. It is the most disreputable sight in the world. Pete would manage to wriggle ahead a few feet, then half roll over on his side and stop. By the time he got under way again he had dropped the bird he was carrying. Then he would give a couple of feeble waves of his head and finally get a grip on the bird. His eyes were more than half closed, but he was game, and at last reached the pile and dropped the woodcock beside it. Then Pete turned to Seth and waited for his drink. Seth wasn't inclined to give it to him, but Pete looked at him with a sort of sleepy but indignant look, as if to say, 'I've earned my drink and I want it,' so Seth put a little liquor in a cup in front of the big snake. Pete drank it. Then he was all in, and Seth had to carry him to the pen. I was shocked clean through.

"'It's a sin and a shame, Seth Hopkins,' I said indignantly. 'You've corrupted those poor creatures and led them into evil ways. It means a drunkard's death for them.

"'It means a pile of woodcocks for me,' replied Seth, ashamed, but sort of sullen like.

"But just as Seth began to be puffed up with pride and haughtiness and to think of nothing except the money his bird-catching blacksnakes would bring him, his hard luck came on him. The snakes, of course, would drink all the whisky they could hold, and Seth, thinking he was making money out of each drink, kept on filling them up to the limit every day. So every night they went to bed drunk, often having putting in a hard day's work, and every morning they woke up with the snake equivalent for a dark-brown taste in their mouths and an eager desire for several bracers.

"For about three weeks Seth kept gathering in a harvest of birds. Then the crash came. The snakes had been acting nervous and irritable, and one night Seth was awakened by a noise in the pen where he kept them. He lit a lantern and started out to investigate. Out in the pen he found, instead of six peacefully sleeping blacksnakes, one tangled mass of twisting heads and tails. The snakes had evidently been uneasy, and two of them had started fighting. Then all six being on the verge of snake delirium tremens, had joined in. Seth did his best to quiet them down, but couldn't do it until all but one of the snakes had been killed. The live one was big Pete, and, as he was pretty well used up, Seth refused to be comforted.

"When Pete got well enough for work again the woodcock season was at an end. Seth was feeling blue when one day Pete came trailing in with a small duck. Then he was the most delighted man you ever saw and gave Pete an extra large drink. I remonstrated with him.

"'It's all right for that big snake of yours to hypnotize woodcock,' I told him. 'That's natural and proper; but when he goes around trying to hypnotize any old thing that comes his way he's sure to get into trouble in the end. You ought to teach him different instead of rewarding him.

"But Seth would not listen. As long as Pete brought in anything that could be sold he should have a drink.

"'The next day I was walking in the woods near Seth's house when I saw, down in a little gully, Pete crawling over the stones, evidently in search of something to hypnotize. Pretty soon a big snapping turtle came out of the creek and waddled up the bank. Pete saw the turtle, and hurrying up, placed himself about ten feet in front of it and began trying to charm it, the same as he would a harmless woodcock. A snapping turtle don't take kindly to being hypnotized, and I tried to warn Pete of his danger by shouting and throwing down stones. But after his reward for the duck, the big snake thought it was proper to try the charming game on any old thing. Pete kept his eye on the turtle and waved his head slowly from side to side, the same tactics which had brought down hundreds of woodcock. But the turtle kept waddling straight ahead until he was within reach of Pete. Then he shot out his ugly head, got a grip on poor Pete's neck and held on, after the placid manner of snapping turtles. Pete squirmed and wriggled, but the turtle stuck to his grip, and when the threshing stopped Pete was dead.

"Seth was heart broken when I told him of the loss of his pet.

"'It's all my fault; I ought to have taught him better,' he groaned. 'But who would have thought that such an intelligent and educated a blacksnake would try to hypnotize a snapping turtle?'"—New York Sun.

THEATRICAL taste is at a very low ebb just now, in many ways at the lowest ebb. The fashion in New York, and New York sets the fashion for the country, is for the salacious, open and undisguised. "Sapho" is a notorious instance, but there are other and worse ones which have attracted less attention at this distance. Life, that clever and "knocking" little sheet, prints weekly a list of six or eight plays running in the metropolis to which no honest man should take an honest woman. "Coralie & Co., Dressmakers," if one can judge from descriptions, must be worse than "Sapho," in that, while the latter makes pretense at a high purpose, "Coralie & Co." makes not even a pretense. Those who believe that art has nothing to do with morals will say, doubtless, that this is not the lowest ebb of the American stage, that such pernicious depth was reached when the Hoyt farce set the fashion, and that the salacious play of the period has the recommendation of being excellently done. The moralist will answer that this excellence of workmanship makes such plays all the more dangerous, on the principle that the most insidious form of vice is that rendered alluring by a beautiful setting.

MISS MARGARET DALY

San Francisco has seen none of the recent outbreaks on the New York stage, thanks to our theatrical seclusion, but we have had one or two plays this season which afford a line on the metropolis. "In Paradise," done early last month by the Frawleys and "Never Again," as produced this week at the Alcazar, were both seen in New York two seasons ago. At the time, they were considered spicy, but nothing especially bad; it was not until "The Degenerates," "Sapho," and "Coralie & Co." came out that Father Knickerbocker woke up. And yet, both the samples we have had in San Francisco this season went clear up to the limit. No grown person could have the slightest doubt as to what "Never Again" was all about. Father Yorke has just placed himself on record as believing San Francisco the "most immoral," etc. Yet the town never took kindly to productions of this class. Anyone who attended "In Paradise" during the second week will remember that the audience showed as large a majority of men as the assemblage at a symphony concert shows a majority of women. "The Turtle" which was an insult to both morals and art, was a huge success in New York and was snubbed completely in San Francisco.

There are signs that the pendulum is about to swing full circle, from the salacious play of French origin to the classic drama. Nearly all the larger playhouses in New York are preparing Shakspearian revivals for next fall. Mansfield, Crane, Southern, Goodwin and others are to include these plays in their repertoire for the coming season. We have not had a Shakespearian actor approaching first rank since Salvini the younger was cut off in his promise; this dearth of real talent may hamper the movement. Yet Shakespearian actors cannot be made unless there is a Shakespearian drama to make them, and among the exceptionally intelligent and able lot contained in New York's younger generation there may be Booth's successor, waiting the chance to develop.

At the Orpheum, Walter Jones and Norma Whalley lead the new bill in what they term a "Comedy Scream." Jones is a clever performer; Miss Whalley is well known for her talents and her personal charms. The Sisters McCoy and Sam Marion are clever comedians and acrobats. Weston and Yost, comedians, W. C. Fields, eccentric juggler, and the Neilson sisters, vocalists, are the other new people. Retained from last week are the Drews, Howard Thurston, Flatow and Dunn and the Moorish troupe of acrobats.

The Alcazar presents next week a society drama, "Diplomacy," an adaptation from Sardou's "Dora," and an old London favorite.

At the California Theatre for the two weeks beginning Sunday afternoon, March 18th, with the exception of Monday evening, March 26th, a legitimate treat is in store. "Puddn'head Wilson," with the late Edwin F. Mayo's Company will be presented with Burr McIntosh, in the title role. Mr. McIntosh is a man of strong individuality and a capable actor and it is said that his work in this role is excellent.

Paderewski will play on Monday evening, March 26, at the California Theatre and on the afternoons of Wednesday and Friday, 28th and 30th.

Gillette's comedy, "Because She Loved Him So," has crowded the Columbia Theatre every performance this week. The piece is to be kept on for another week and will be followed by Willie Collier in his new farce comedy entitled "Mr. Smooth." Collier is held in high esteem here by virtue of his fine comedy work in the "The Man From Mexico." He will have a strong company in support.

At the Orpheum this week the chief new feature is the engagement of Mr. and Mrs. Sydney Drew in their one-act comedy, "Love Will Find the Way." Mr. Sydney Drew, like his more famous brother John, is a capable actor in his line, and deserves better opportunities than are afforded by the very slight construction of his present play, the plot of which is not new, nor the situations strong. Husbands ere this have cured their jealous (stage wives) of jealousy by feigning to be likewise jealous and violent. The Drews, however, held the interest of the house; which was what they were there to do. Other of the more popular numbers were the negro impersonations, by Flatow and Dunn, and "Just a German Girl," by Fanny Fields.

A note from Mrs. Minnie Maddern Fiske to a friend, in San Francisco, says that she may possibly visit San Francisco this season. She is not booked for any of the local theatres, but Mrs. Fiske is now a free lance, travelling under her own management and the only actor on the American stage independent of the more or less mythical "syndicate." She is in some respects the greatest actress on the American stage, and her appearance will be a great event.

After shocking all New York with "Naughty Anthony," the play with hosiery-model "business," David Belasco has produced a beautiful and delicate little tragedy, which has fairly taken New York by storm. "Madame Butterfly," it is called, and is an adaptation from John Luther Long's Japanese story of the same title. The most effective scene is one in which the deserted native wife waits all night at the casement for her recreant lover. Not a word is spoken in all this time. Blanche Bates, perhaps, is rather robust of mould to portray with perfect versimilitude the Japanese doll, but nevertheless her tragic and pathetic work has caught all the critics.

MISS CLARA LIPPMAN.

The Infinities.

TIME and Space and Number flow
Ever onward; none shall know
Whence they come, or where they go.

None shall know; they will not bend
Their majestic course; nor blend,
Infinite, with things that end.

None shall know; the mind may sound
Dreaming voids, and find no bound
To the wall-less prison round.

Winding-sheet of woven shade,
None shall e'er thy word evade;
None shall know! 'T is thou hast said.

None; unless man, too, may climb
Clear of bounds, till Thought sublime
Conquer Number, Space, and Time.

C. H. Page, in Century.

Poverty.

Fair my estate at morn to see;
I had at eve the selfsame store;
Yet fate that day had beggared me,
Since hope could I count mine no more.

Arlo Bates, in March Century

HIS EXCUSE.—Colonel Barton of the Connaught Rangers had found it necessary to lecture his soldier-servant on the sin of untruthfulness. "It was not only a lie you told me," said he, "but a stupid lie at that." "Faith, sorr," answered the man, "I see'd ye were in a raging temper, and I lost me prisence of mind!"

New Stories Re-Told.

x x x

A CONFESSION, NOT A SPEECH.—James Neill, the actor manager, engaged for one of his productions a lady amateur whose zeal outran her discretion. She could not follow instructions. She had two lines to speak in the play but was not satisfied, and made up to Neill at rehearsal. "Mr. Neill, I have one line in the first act and one in the second. Couldn't you give me one for the third act too?" Mr. Neill thought a minute of what trouble the girl had caused him and said: "Yes, in the banquet scene in the last act you may enter and say: 'Here is a ham.'" "Oh," she said, "do I bring a ham on with me?" "No, my dear," said Mr. Neill, "it is not a speech, it is a confession."

x

DID NOT UNDERSTAND DECIMALS.—Lord Randolph Churchill's appointment as Chancellor of the Exchequer, the annual statement of the British finances was presented to him for signature. He looked over the terrific array of figures and remarked to the chief secretary. "I can't make head or tail of this. Why don't you arrange the figures so that one can understand them?" "My lord, I have adopted the simplest known method; I have used decimals throughout." "Yes, yes, I see, but I never did know what those dammed dots meant," was his lordship's reply. And yet Lord Randolph was an able "financier."

x

THE DRUNK'S APPROBATION.—While the Cannought Rangers were quartered in Edinburgh there was a great deal of drunkenness and disorder in the regiment, and the Colonel made up his mind that it had to cease. So early one morning parade he ordered an old offender, who had been out all night, to be marched across the regiment's front in his muddy tunic and torn trousers, as an awful warning. When the prisoner arrived at the left flank, he turned to the Colonel, saluted him and said, just as if he had been some swell inspecting them. "Thank ye, Colonel; faith, it's one av the foinest regiments I've ever seen. Ye may dismiss them!"

x

A RARE CASE.—Not long ago a Boston clergyman received an evening call from an elderly man and woman who expressed a wish to be joined in the bonds of matrimony then and there. "Have you ever been married before?" asked the clergyman of the man, an honest eyed, weather-beaten person of seafaring aspect. "Never, and never wanted to be before," was the prompt reply. "And have you ever been married before?" the question came to the woman. "No, sir," she replied with equal promptness; and with a touch of humor that appealed to the clergyman at once, she added, "I never had a chance!"

x

A MISDIRECTED COMPLIMENT.—Soon after her return from Europe where, she had achieved many triumphs, Leonora Jackson, the clever violinist, was given a reception in Pittsburg. She was to play at a concert soon after and her admirers were laying the compliments on thick. "Miss Jackson," said one enthusiast, "you have done more for the Stars and Stripes abroad than our arms did in the war with Spain." "I am very much obliged to you," was the quick response, "but I really did not know my execution was as deadly as all that."

x

"A GRAUN' INVENTION."—Two farm servants came to Aberdeen to spend New Year's Day. Arriving by train, they immediately made their way to the terminus of the electric tramway circuit, where, after looking at the new creation with much wonder, they decided upon having a ride. "Wull," said man Jock, "this is a graun' invention. In Edinburgh I saw them drive the cars wi' an iron rape aneth street, in Dundee they pu' them wi an engine, but, michty man, wha wad a' thocht they could ca' them wi' a fishing rod!"

x

A SLIGHT ERROR IN NAMES.—Lord Beauchamp, the Governor of New South Wales is a most pronounced aristocrat. Imagine his feelings when, at a state dinner party in Sidney, a good but homely old lady, the wife of one of the ministry, confided to him that she had nightly blessed the name of his father. On being asked when and where she had made the latter's acquaintance, she replied: "Oh, I have taken his famous pills regularly for years!"

x

TRYING TO DISCOVER PRETORIA.—A deputation collecting subscriptions for a new North Pole expedition approached Secretary Joseph Chamberlain for a contribution. After listening in grim silence to what they had to say, Chamberlain readjusted his eyeglass and said: "Gentlemen, I am informed that the North Pole is in a place where it will keep sweet for a reasonable length of time. I am trying to discover Pretoria. Good-day."

PALACE and GRAND HOTELS

For nearly a quarter of a century these Hotels have been the recognized headquarters for Tourists and Travelers visiting San Francisco.

Their popularity has been acquired by reason of their unique location (being accessible to wholesale and shipping districts and amusement centers), the peculiar excellence of cuisine and service, and moderate charges.

The Grill Rooms for ladies and gentlemen have an international reputation, and the recently added Supper Room is now recognized as the place to obtain after-theatre refreshments.

SAN FRANCISCO—March 24, 1900—SEATTLE

EVENTS CURRENT.

A Lull in the Transvaal War. Not since Lord Roberts took full control of things at the front has there been so quiet a week in South Africa. Buller is scouting and skirmishing, putting out feelers toward Laing's Nek; Roberts is resting his army in Bloemfontein—for the capture of the Free State capitol, announced as a rumor in this department last week, has proved to be a reality. It is the lull between storms. The situation has improved greatly however. Bloemfontein yielded without resistance, Steyn and his cabinet retiring to the Transvaal, while the town authorities gave themselves up to the British. Since that time, the Free State burghers have shown a general disposition to give up the war. Farms found abandoned on the first British advance are occupied again by their owners, who are returning from the Boer army. At Edinburgh and elsewhere, eighteen hundred burghers have laid down their arms to General Pole-Carew. Roberts is at present in Bloemfontein, arranging for a provisional government for the city and the region, while the advance-guard of his forces has pushed across the border and now rests in Transvaal territory. With their allies forsaking them, Kruger's people will have to fight to the finish alone, and there is no sign of them backing down, like the Free Staters. The situation at Mafeking, upon which all attention is concentrated, has undergone no visible change. The relieving force has not yet succeeded in lifting the siege and Baden-Powell and his little garrison still hold out; that is all that's known for a certainty. When the press censorship began to be enforced on this point, about two weeks ago, the place was full of sickness and short of both provisions and ammunition. There is no reason to think that these conditions have improved. The relieving force is within fourteen miles of the town, but they have still to traverse a rough country held by an enemy of unknown strength and untested spirit.

Russia Changes Front in Asia. No little uneasiness has been felt in England during this time of pressure because of Russia's threatening attitude in two directions. On the borders of Afghanistan, the Czar's armies seemed to be making a demonstration toward Herat and North British India, and in the other direction the assistance extended to the finances of Persia gave rise to the suspicion that Russia was playing for her opening on the Persian Gulf. It was an opportune time, when Great Britain, the natural balance to hold Russia in check, had her hands full in another direction, and English statesmen and journalists began to anticipate a war with Russia on two borders of India. The latest news from Saint Petersburg is of far different tenor. The Czar is said to have rebuked M. Kuropatkin, Minister of War, for his "rashness" in playing against the English border and M. Witte, Minister of Finance, for exceeding his authority in assuring Persia that Russia would guarantee the Shah's foreign loan. It is even hinted in the official press that M. Kuropatkin will be removed for ordering the demonstration against the Indian border. Following this, the Official Gazette of St. Petersburg prints a paragraph stating that the Czar intends to present a strictly neutral front during the whole Transvaal war. The suspicious thing about this change of front is the date of its occurrence. When the three British columns were all held in check and it seemed as though the whole strength of the Empire were needed in South Africa, the Czar was menacing Persia and India, and the Russian Minister at London speaks mysteriously of the Czar's intentions; as soon as the Boer cause crumbles, the Czar announces that it was all a mistake and disciplines his ministers. To one who understands the shifty character of Russian diplomacy, this change of attitude proves clearly enough what action would have been taken had the war not turned for the better just when it did.

Discouraging Outlook in Luzon. If the latest news from Manila be true, events in the Philippines are going very badly, and the worst fears of the military authorities are realized. Our officers know that the subjugation of the present insurrection in the islands is only a matter of time. But the question as to whether the natives would remain subdued has given the military government the greatest anxiety. And now, in Manila, where the American system of government has been given every chance, where all that could be done to restore order and insure safety has been attended to, our rule has produced so little impression on the people that a new revolution is brewing in the city. It is the most discouraging news possible, since it goes to prove that our "silent, sullen people" must not only be conquered but reconquered ad infin. So active have become the members of the Filipino junta in the capital city, that Manila gives the army more concern than all the rest of Luzon. A number of representative insurgents have been there lately holding conferences, and twice in the past week attempts have been made to smuggle in arms. It is asserted upon good authority that three loads of arms and ammunition have lately been landed on the coast not far from Manila, while several suspected filibusters, notably one Spitzel of Hongkong, are operating in the town. In certain other outside districts where we have been in long occupation conditions are equally discouraging. In General McArthur's district, evidence accumulates that the municipal presidents sworn to support our rule are treacherously aiding the insurgents. A few have had the grace to resign and cast off their allegiance, but most of them hold office and communicate with Aguinaldo's people in secret. In the province of Morongo, active insurgent reorganization is going on, and the Tagalos are gathering again in Zambales. In Albay an insurgent force, said to be out of ammunition, is burning farms and driving "amigos" into the towns. Brigands are committing atrocities of all sorts in Nueva Ecija and Tarlac, where twenty-eight murders are reported within one week. As a check on the bandits, two who were caught and convicted of murder will be hanged at Bayambang on March 20.

Uneasy Times in China. During the past week, the yellow Democratic press of this country, which has been trying to prove a collusion between the administration and the English government, has been circulating a report that the Secretary of the Navy was about to send a squadron to the coast of China to act in conjunction with the British fleet in checking the evident influence of Russia with the Chinese Emperor. The basis of truth in this willful perversion is that the authorities, knowing that the situation is strained, are holding themselves in readiness to act in case American interests are jeopardized. The Oregon and New Orleans happen to be in the neighborhood of Nagasaki, Japan, and will be held there in readiness. General Otis has been asked if he can furnish troops for China in case of necessity. But all this is only by way of preparation for a possible future, and no move will be made unless the situation changes. There is no doubt that China is very, very "sick." The country is on the verge of civil war. The spread of European ideas, it seems, had gone farther than anyone suspected until the Empress Dowager issued her edicts ordering a return to the old order. The change was accepted with discontent, and at one time popular opinion seemed in a fair way to assert itself and cause a return to the regime of the deposed emperor. Now, powerful secret societies throughout the empire are preparing to rise. Kang Yu Weis, a stalwart of the European party, banished when the Empress Dowager seized the power, is to be the head of the rebellion; his agents are active throughout China and in at least five of the southern provinces reformist forces are organized and are arming and drilling. To further complicate matters, Germany is hurrying troops into the province of Shantung, where a number of Germans reside and hold commercial concessions of considerable value, under the excuse that the lives and property of Europeans are in danger. To the north there are murmurs of a naval war between Japan and Russia over the control of Corea and Northern China, an event which, should it happen, would almost certainly bring about a general Oriental war and the breaking-up of the Celestial Empire. Bloodshed of some sort may be expected within the next six months, as the situation is strained in all directions.

The New Naval Program. The House Committee on Naval Affairs is about to recommend to Congress the largest naval appropriation ever made in this country, exceeding by a half that of 1892, the year when this country first fully awoke to the necessity of modern warships. The program as outlined calls for $62,000,000. The new vessels recommended include two battle-ships of 13,500 tons, and of the highest practicable speed, to cost about $6,000,000 each; three armored cruisers of the highest speed and about the same size and cost as the battleships; three protected cruisers of 8000 tons, of high speed and costing about $4,500,000 each. No gunboats are mentioned in the recommendations, because of the craft of this class recently purchased from Spain in Luzon, and torpedo boats are also slighted, owing to the low opinion held by Secretary Long and his advisers concerning this style of craft and the delay of a final decision regarding the efficacy of the Holland submarine boat. This program is altered in several particulars from that recommended by the Navy Department. Their program included no battleships but contained a recommendation for twelve gunboats. The changes were made at the suggestion of Admiral Dewey.

Louisiana Circumscribes the Negro Vote. An attempt is being made in the State of Louisiana to circumscribe the colored vote by disfranchising ignorant colored voters, while allowing ignorant whites the full privileges of citizens. The whites of Louisiana, in common with those of other Southern States, are opposed to the enfranchisement of the negro on principle, but are obliged to permit it by the Fifteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States. The negroes of that State happen to be the most ignorant of all the race, however, and the disqualification was attempted through an educational clause. Mississippi tried the experiment some years ago by passing a law providing that no voter could qualify unless he was able to read the Constitution or "to understand it when read to him." The law was tested in the courts and held valid, and has been applied in such manner that it disqualified negroes only, since whites are never challenged. Louisiana has gone farther in trying to pass a law which shall hold in itself without the help of a partisan interpretation. This is the text of a provision in the new franchise bill of Louisiana, which requires as a qualification for voters ability to read and write and the possession of $300 worth of taxable property: "No male person who was on January 1, 1867, or at any date prior thereto, entitled to vote under the Constitution or statutes of any State of the United States wherein he then resided, and no son or grandson of any such person not less than 21 years of age at the date of the adoption of this Constitution, and no person of foreign birth who shall have been naturalized prior to the first day of January, 1898, shall be denied the right to register and vote in this State by reason of his failure to possess the educational qualifications prescribed by this Constitution; provided, he shall have resided in this State for five years next preceding the date at which he shall apply for registration, and shall have registered in accordance with the terms of this article prior to September 1, 1898, and no person shall be entitled to register under this section after said date." While this looks innocent enough on the surface, it is in reality so constructed that no white voter, no matter how ignorant, shall be cut off from voting, while no negro shall be able to qualify under this special clause. The intent is clear; in fact, the legislators of Louisiana do not deny that the bill is aimed against negro citizens. A test case is pending before the Federal Supreme Court, and is being watched eagerly throughout the South. Should it be declared constitutional, North Carolina, Georgia and Virginia will introduce measures of like purport next fall. It is not likely that it will pass the Federal Courts, however. The Mississippi law, while aimed at the characteristics of a race, was not aimed at the race itself, and the favorable decision of the Supreme Court was made on that ground. In the Louisiana law, on the other hand, the exceptions are pretty clearly in favor of a race rather than the characteristics of a race. Upon this hair-splitting difference rests the political future of millions of Southern negroes.

A New Diplomatic Service. It will be remembered that in Richard Olney's latest remarkable utterance on our national growth, condensed for this department last week, the antiquity of the United States consular service is especially condemned. This has been a neglected branch of the government service. Since its first institution Congress has never passed a single bill changing or improving it, save in the alteration of salary lists and the creation of new posts. When Jackson was President and a man who had been to Europe was a rarity, the service was adequate, but even before the late territorial and commercial expansion of the nation, it had far outgrown its clothing of statutes. To correct this, several new bills bearing on the service are now before Congress. The one which is most generally approved is the Lodge bill, generally called the "Chamber of Commerce Bill," from the number of commercial bodies that have indorsed it. The most important provisions are as follows: The consulates are to be reclassified at once, useless posts being dropped and others being added. The new gradation shall be by classes and not by places, and the stations of consuls may be changed as the exigencies of the service demand. This permits the promotion of good men and a general merit system, a thing not possible under present conditions. Salaries are to be reorganized, and are to range from $1500 to $8000 a year. The fee system is abolished. Admission to the service shall be after examination; for each vacancy, the names of five persons who have passed successfully shall be given to the President, who shall choose the appointee from the number. The new consul shall serve on probation for one year, during which period he may be dropped at any time. After that, he cannot be removed except for cause. Promotion will be a regular feature. In making promotions, the President may skip a grade in favor of an able man or one who has rendered great public service, provided the reasons for so doing are made public. As the bill provides for six grades of consuls and four of consuls-general, advancement should be fairly rapid. All appointees must show themselves proficient in the language of the country to which they are accredited, and, in posts where the consul acts as judge, they must pass examinations in law. The President may recall any consul for service in the State Department for a period of not over one year, and any employee of the State Department may be appointed to a consulate paying a salary no higher than the one he was receiving at home. This provides for an interchange between the home and foreign branches of the department. These are the leading features of the measure, which is modelled on the best features of the systems prevailing in Great Britain, Germany and the other countries which have organized consular services as part of the diplomatic institution. Its passage is probable, providing it can be placed before Congress in the present crowded session, which is not likely.

Politics and Congressional Problems. Politics are being made very fast in Washington over the Puerto Rico tariff and the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. There has been developed considerable friction within the Republican party which, if there were a strong Democratic leader, could not but figure prominently in the approaching electoral contest. The Puerto Rico bill as originally moved by Senator Foraker favored free trade, but he was constrained to shift his ground. Now Senator Cushman K. Davis, one of the strongest men in the Senate, refuses to accept any compromise tariff, and insists on free trade being extended to the people of both countries. Ex-President Harrison, whose great political sagacity is conceded by his bitterest antagonists, has also been heard from, deprecating the policy of levying duties on Puerto Rican importations. So the task of the leaders who expect to have a harmonious gathering at the National Convention in June grows more difficult daily. Add to this the acrimonious discussion stirred up by the yellow journals over the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. There must be a definite disposition of the Clayton-Bulwer covenant before the Nicaragua Canal can really be got at, and it is either this compact or another. The opposition is really a reflection of journalistic attack rather than a serious objection to the treaty as it stands. Still the opposition holds up the canal bill, and will doubtless interfere with the passage of other measures of importance to the country. The chances seem now to favor an early adjournment of Congress, and in that event it is probable the Puerto Rico bill will be withdrawn in favor of a resolution entrusting the government of the island to the President until a better understanding of the needs of Puerto Rico be gained by Senators. It seems certain that the reciprocity treaties will be shelved altogether. The Shipping bill, although amended to meet the demands of those who were opposed rather to its details than to the principle upon which it is constructed, will also be put upon an already crowded shelf. There does not seem the remotest chance that the Philippine problem will be touched upon. Indeed, it has been practically agreed on to leave the disposition of that troublous subject until after the people have been heard from in November.

EDITORIAL COMMENT

The Minister's Mission.

"HERE'S a howdy do!" Lay Brother Watt reads his brothers of the cloth a curtain lecture upon pulpit morale, and the importance of fidelity to the fashion plates in the fabric and the cut of their clerical apparel. Be it remembered that Brother Watt is of the "straightest sect," a Methodist. All Methodists are supposed to be exemplars of Christian gladness. This, in days gone by, was evidenced by their propensity to shout, and to ejaculate "Amen!" "God be praised!" etc. It is not hazarding too much to say they used to yield to such propensity in the days when Brother Stebbins was numbered among the faithful exhorters; before he became a convert from Trinitarianism, Sanctification, etc., to Unitarianism, Utilitarianism, etc., and correspondingly, a staid, sober-minded, prosaic, reasoning gentleman and scholar rather than a mere theological dogmatist. Brother Stebbins, in an open letter to Brother Watt, indulged in some charitable raillery at the expense of modern Methodism as exemplified by Brother Watt. Brother S. implied that the latter-day innovations are out of semblance with Wesleyan Methodism. The good old days of the shouting revival and the love-feast camp-meeting are gone never to return; and these distinctive festivals of Methodist religious zeal have become obsolete by being lost in the ruck of latter-day religious fads. Indeed, Brother Stebbins, in good-natured Christian-like sarcasm, tells Brother Watt that he has departed from the house of the fathers of Methodism in his search after something new and novel, and is now wandering in the wilderness of worldliness. This would never do for a Methodist, but for a Unitarian—well, a Unitarian is free to adopt his own religious methods, and to change them whensoever and howsoever he pleases.

But, a truce to badinage! This is serious business. A preacher of the gospel is a man with a mission. That mission is not to dress like a dandy either in or out of the pulpit. Neither is it to dress as an eccentric or as a slouch. Of course, he must dress. Even John the Baptist wore a costume. Though the primeval crudity and simplicity of John's garb was expressive of the greatest meekness and that self-sacrificing spirit (which should characterize the Christian minister even in this materialistic age), yet that costume would not be appropriate as a ministerial garb either in or out of the pulpit, in so populous, cosmopolitan and more or less refined community as the United States. Our latter-day preachers can attire themselves in something more than the Baptist's habiliments and still be without ostentation, clothed in meekness and humility (as well as black worsted or broadcloth), fit exemplars of the teachings of the pure, holy and all-wise Nazarene.

As between severe plainness in dress and studied elegance, the former is infinitely more befitting a minister of Christ than the latter. If the preacher in the pulpit presents the appearance of an animated clerical fashion plate, it shows that he thinks more of how he would appear personally than he thought in devout earnestness of the discourse he was to deliver, and his dandified appearance would distract the attention and serious thoughtfulness of his hearers. They would be rapt in their admiration of his immaculate apparel. His personnel would charm their senses. The extreme unction which would be given to their eyes as they looked upon him in all his splendor would dull their sense of hearing. They would be neither hearers or doers of the word. After the service, there would be a spontaneous verdict, not, "What a good, thoughtful, helpful sermon that was!" but "Wasn't he fiine!" or "Wasn't he grand!" Or maybe some of the extremely impressionable and gushy ones of the gentler sex would put it, "Wasn't he lovely! How exquisitely he dresses!" Whereas, on the other hand, if the preacher were plainly but neatly garbed, and put his thought and eloquence into his sermon rather than in his clothes, he would be a source of spiritual edification rather than mere temporal delectation to his hearers.

The true mission of Christ's ministers is to do as nearly as possible, in all things, at all times, in all places, and under all circumstances, as the good book leads us to believe that Christ would do were he upon earth amid the same environment. If they do not this as pastors—shepherds of their flocks—how may it be expected that the sheep will be guided in ways of righteousness—that is, right living? If the shepherd goes wrong, it is only natural that the sheep will do likewise, for the sheep will follow the shepherd wheresoever he leads, even if it is into the brambles and briars—that is, if the sheep know and have confidence in their shepherd. If Christ were to come to San Francisco He would not think about what kind of clothes He would wear; He would not select some sensational subject upon which to discourse and announce it in the newspapers with a view to drawing a crowd. He would simply devote His whole time and energies to good works among the people, ministering especially to the temporal needs of the deserving poor. By this means He would inculcate lessons of genuine charity which His followers would heed, and the world would be profited thereby. What the world needs is more Christianity and less of churchanity; more doing in the spirit of Christ and less theological dogmatizing. Paraphrasing the proverb of Solomon: "Righteousness exalteth a church community, but clerical fops are a reproach to any people."

To paraphrase more scriptural texts, "Charity covereth a multitude of sins, but ministerial mountebanks are an abomination to God, and the wayfaring man, though a fool, passeth by on the other side."

The Wave is not a church journal, but we are of the opinion that if there were more Moodys in the pulpit as pastors the world would be muchly bettered.

A New View on Degeneration.

AN authoritative contribution to the vast literature of "Degeneration" is made by Professor Ireland in the March number of the International Monthly. "The sum of what I have learned in my studies of the history of the men of the past," he says, "is—what we are, they were. Since the Evangelist's time men have been much the same in stature, in strength, in mental capacity, even in courage and endurance; they are the same in their desires, their pleasures, their passions, even in their tastes, in everything save in their affectations, in their artificialities." Professor Ireland goes on to deny the oft-repeated argument that the men of today are of larger growth than human beings of the early geological periods; the Greeks surpassed in mental power and equalled in physical strength any living people; the Roman legionary, marching with heavy loads, seems to have excelled what would be expected of the most robust soldier of modern days. Examination of medieval skeletons give measurements averaging very evenly with those of the present era. In considering the question—Are we degenerating? distinction must be made between a general decline of the population and a deterioration in particular classes. Communities now live under better sanitary conditions than at the beginning of the century, and wages have doubled within the last fifty years. In Great Britain, pauperism has much diminished, and education has undertaken all classes in the British Isles as well as in France, Germany, Scandanavia and North America. The progress of medicine and a diffusion of the laws of health have been of much benefit in mitigating suffering and checking disease. The difficulties and perils of child-birth have been alleviated. Certain ailments like scurvy are now seldom heard of. Over-indulgence in liquor is less prevalent among the middle classes, and is really abating among the poorer classes. In France, however, drunkenness is increasing. There has been a fall in the death rate both in England and Scotland through these improved conditions of life, and though Herbert Spencer argues that this general prevention of disease by means of medical science defeats the natural selection process by which the weak are eliminated, still, the same measures which save the ailing must increase the health of the robust.

To offset this improvement are other conditions less favorable to the well-being of the race. Most important among these is the rapid increase of the town population and the depressing influences of want, and toil amid unhealthy surroundings. For instance, the average weight of factory children in England is 18 pounds below the general English mean. It is undeniable also that life is faster and more restless than in our ancestors' times, and there has been a decided increase in nervousness. It is shown by greater sensitiveness, a want of endurance and a deficient power of recovery. Statistics of deaths in England and Wales for the period between 1866 and 1890 show an increase of 10.2 per cent in nervous diseases; 65.9 per cent in heart diseases; 63.4 in kidney diseases; 103.1 in diabetes; 24.2 in suicides. A similar increase is found in Holland. In all civilized countries save Norway the number of suicides is advancing. There is also, in the United Kingdom, a serious augmentation of the numbers of the insane. The census returns for Scotland in 1871 showed one insane person for every 494 of the population; in 1891, it was one insane for every 385. In the United States, however, there is a decrease. The total number of lunatics to the million in 1870 was 971; in 1880, 1833; in 1890, 1697.

Yet the improvement in the conditions of living by no means guarantees that the destiny of the race is upward. We are as likely to degenerate as to progress. The old Romans saw and deplored the causes of decline in their empire and were powerless to arrest them. This is a critical period, and Professor Ireland mentions some of the dangers that look ominous for the future of humanity. One is the overpressure upon young people connected with school tasks and competitions. The toil, vexations and disappointments connected with examinations pervade almost all branches of knowledge. From over-study come kidney diseases and neurasthenia, and to young women chlorosis and neuralgia. Examinations, the writer believes, should be taken out of the hands of the teaching class. More far-reaching than the danger from this source, however, is the withdrawal of women from their natural duties. Almost all the women of the bourgeoise class in France have given up nursing their children; in France and Massachusetts the birth-rate is scarcely higher than the death-rate. In Massachusetts the mothers of foreign birth have twice as many children as the native mothers. This withdrawal of the mother from her natural duties is also the cause of neglect of children in their infancy. Farinacious and chemical preparations advertised to imitate mother's milk and the india-rubber sucking bottle now replace the nursing mother. This artificial feeding explains the deplorable condition of the teeth in most young people. Dr. James Cantlie is quoted as declaring: "Pleasure in one phase of society and self-imposed labor in the other have deprived the infant of its natural food. The natural calling of both classes is being sapped by the shadowy myth of female rights and independence, and the future is being sacrificed to pure selfishness." Professor Ireland ends with a prophetic warning: "Woe to the states which suffer such doctrines as these to gain hold; their places will be taken from them and given to people who obey the voice of nature and recognize the right order of things!"

The Constitution, Congress and Porto Rico.

I WANT to say a few words, through the columns of The Wave, anent the proposed Porto Rican tariff, that being the paramount subject before the American people at this time.

What is the United States Constitution? The organic of the country. What country? The United States of law America. What meaneth that? The landed and peopled domain subject to the jurisdiction and control of the United States Government. Arizona is not a state, but a territory of the federation of states and territories designated "The United States." How was Arizona given the status of territory? By act of Congress approved by the Chief Executive, definitely declarative. Are there any customs duties imposed upon the products of Arizona that come into any other state or territory of the Union? No. Is there any customs' duties collected in Arizona upon the products of any other territory or state of the Union that come into Arizona? No. Why? Because the Constitution prohibits.

Is Porto Rico a part of the landed domain of the United States? Yes. How was it made so? By virtue of the terms of cession of the Spanish-American peace treaty negotiated at Paris. Was there any provision or stipulation in that treaty by which was determined and defined the political status of Porto Rico in relationship to our federated Union? No. Has such status yet been determined and defined officially by any power constitutionally vested with the prerogative? No. Then, while Porto Rico is a part of the landed domain of the United States it is neither a state or a territory definitely and constitutionally declared and so recognized.

Well, then, what status has it? It is a dependency, an outside, detached dependency.

And Congress purposes legislating for Porto Rico's people as inhabitants of a colonial dependency, does it? That is, treating the people of Porto Rico, not as citizens, even when they can and would comply with United States laws governing admission to citizenship—but as subjects?

But what have been the judicial opinions upon this question, of the great jurists who have in the past, clothed in the ermine of their high office, sat as final arbiters of the Constitution? That such a thing as a United States dependency or colony detached from the mainland is an anomaly. Such a thing could not be, without an amendment to the Constitution.

Then, since Porto Rico has not been, by Congressional enactment approved by the President, made a state or territory of the United States, and, under the limitations of the Constitution that island possessions of the United States cannot be held and governed permanently as a dependency not subject to the provisions and limitations of the Constitution. Congress is premature, isn't it, in enacting any legislation for Porto Rico in relationship to the United States? It would certainly seem that way. What then, should be done?

Congress should, by declarative act, make of Porto Rico a territory of the United States, and so many of its people citizens who are eligible to the franchise. Or, it should, by declarative act, make of the island a colonial dependency, and of its people subjects of the United States.

In the former case, there could be no legislation constitutionally imposing customs tariff upon Porto Rican imports and exports with reference to markets of the mainland of our federated Union, In the latter case, such legislation could be had, and in due time the question, wholly constitutional, as to whether the United States Government may maintain Porto Rico as a colonial dependency, would be adjudicated once and for all by the court of last resort, as result of an action protesting the payment of customs duties upon the exports and imports of Porto Rican products to the United States, and of United States products to Porto Rico.

The writer is of the opinion that justice to the Porto Ricans, whom we took under our jurisdiction and control without their formal assent, demands that Porto Rico be made a territory of the United States; that its people who can and do comply with our laws regulating the franchise shall be admitted to citizenship, enjoying the benefits and immunities extended by our laws based upon the Constitution. In other words, that the Constitution does and must follow the flag wherever it permanently waves. To quote President McKinley: "Our flag does not mean one thing in the United States and another in Cuba or Puerto Rico."

This would compel free trade between Porto Rico and the balance of our federated Union; and under the circumstances of our acquisition of Porto Rico this would be right, because simple justice.

THINGS & PEOPLE

By BOSWELL Jr.

A Little Drama of the War.

ALTHOUGH we are more than a year away from the first Tagal outbreak in Manila, stories of the exciting days preceding and succeeding the historic Feb. 5th are still coming in. A dramatic incident which has never found its way into print was told by a returning volunteer last week. It was on the Sunday afternoon preceding the day of the outbreak. There was a strong tension on both sides, and everyone was waiting for the first shot. A Kansas sentry was walking his beat along the Pasig, and a group of unarmed Americans were loafing near by, watching the antics of the Filipino sentry on the opposite bank. He had evidently been ordered to watch the American, and was imitating his every move. When the Kansan stopped, the native stopped; when the Kansan shifted his gun, the native did the same. Presently, a boat manned by a single Filipino came down the river. The American, who was under orders to stop and search all such craft, brought his rifle to a "port," and shouted "Venir Aqui!" (Come here). His enemy on the opposite bank did the same. The boatman hesitated between two commands, while the rival sentries repeated their order. For a few seconds the situation stood thus, then the native cocked his gun and pointed it at the boatman. The Kansan, never hesitating for a moment, dropped on one knee and drew a bead straight on the head of his enemy. Thus the situation stood for a minute, which seemed to last an hour; the Filipino covering the boatman, the American covering the Filipino, and twenty unarmed Americans watching, powerless to help. Then, the native sentry's nerve gave out all at once. Dropping his gun, he sneaked away in the underbrush, to an accompaniment of American cheers.

Uncle Sam and Alaska.

IF any one fact concerning Alaska has been more clearly demonstrated than another it is that the national administration has at last become alive to the importance of the territory and its rich promise of even better things to come. The government has already done much for the territory, but a great work has only just started. The impetus was first felt with regard to the mail service for Alaska, and this has been followed by elaborate plans for garrisoning the country. Upon the heels of those two steps of progress has come a plan for the exploration and development of the less known sections of the territory by the construction of roads, bridges and telegraph lines. This summer will see a great increase and improvement in the judiciary and administrative forces resident in Alaska. When all this is occomplished, Alaskans will have very little to ask of the general government until they are ready for statehood. One of the latest moves to be ordered is the complete garrisoning of the territory by two regiments of troops and the construction of thirty or more post barracks for their accommodation. This work is actually in progress. General Randall, commander of the new military department of Alaska, reached Seattle this week accompanied by his staff en route to his new field.

As to the mail facilities in the north, they are far and away better than they have been in the past. A five days mail from Dawson to Skagway is something of an achievement; and while it is outside of American territory most of the way, it is by the energy of this government that such a service was made possible. There has also been a monthly winter mail up and down the Yukon; a mail in and out over the new Valdes-Tanana-Eagle City trail built last summer and this spring; and a new mail to Nome by the Katmai route. When navigation opens, mail will go through as often as big steamers can carry it. Just now there will be a little intermission, for the Katmai route is as yet undetermined, and but one mail has been sent out. There will be no further communication with Nome until the Alpha sails from Victoria, April 3.

Acquiring Public Utilities.

THE impression in certain quarters that the Supervisors of San Francisco are agitating the municipal ownership problem for love of the topic should be dissipated at once. It is a stern and intricate subject, not to be approached save in fear and trembling, but a provision of the Charter renders it obligatory on the board to procure plans and estimates of the cost and construction of water works within one year after the instrument has gone into effect. Hence the prevalence of utilities at recent meetings of the city fathers. There are some excellent men on the board—perhaps the best ever pressed into municipal service—and among them there seems to be an earnest desire to deal fairly with the corporations and to avoid all demagogic display. To the average observer there is but one way to become possessed of gas or water works—to purchase the stocks and bonds of the controlling corporation at the market rate. The adoption of any other course will undoubtedly be resisted. Imagine offering Spring Valley fifteen millions for its property when it has fourteen millions of bonds outstanding.

A Literary Calm.

IN matters literary, San Francisco is in the lull between periods. That curious city, "which never knows its prophets until they are known abroad," has a way of bringing up and educating a school of writers and sending them on, as soon as they are recognized, to do their work abroad. First there was the old school of the giants, with Bret Harte, Joaquin Miller and Ina Coolbrith at the head; these went their way, and there was a pause until the turbulent journalistic school, smiters of the Walter McEwen order, rose, flourished, and went on to more remunerative fields. Lastly, there were "Les Jeunes," and the people of their time, such clever writers as Gellett Burgess—who is said to be about to return to the Coast—Frank Norris and Juliet Wilber Tompkins. They also passed away, and the field is barren. Markham took a rachet flight of his own last year, and is gone. Only two young writers of any promise have shown here lately. They are Jack London, who is doing some clever story work, and young Scheffauer, a poet whom Ambrose Bierce claims to have discovered and who has the real fire in him. Perhaps this may be the first sign of another set now learning the business in this training school of young writers.

Wheeler on Free Text Books.

THE stand taken by President Wheeler of the University of California against the free text book system is so sensible that it scarcely needs defending. Every teacher and school director in the State realizes that the thing is cumbersome and expensive, and that it is wide open for political jugglery and steals. The opportunity afforded for a grab at the public sack is the only reason which I, personally, can see for its adoption by the fathers of the commonwealth. Even at that, the last has not been said. The arrangement is one which gives the worst books obtainable at the price instead of the best. In place of works compiled by recognized authorities, we have a set of treatises put together by men whose main qualification for the task is the fact that they are Californians. Some of the text-books used at present are the joke of Eastern educators. The grammar prescribed in the State schools to-day dates back to the time of the three R's. The system should go, for it is neither good education nor good economics, but it is wrapped in so much constitutional barbed wire that it will last for many years even in the face of heavy protest. However, one can not expect too much from a state which taxes its free universities.

The Seattle Election Again.

THE recent election in Seattle was marked by a short, lively campaign and a long aftermath. The reformers and their Good Templar leader are still wondering what hit them; the successful party has not recovered from amazement at the remarkable plurality—1,500 in a total vote of 9,000. Viewed from this distance, it is easy to see that the reform party made their mistake by nominating a man who was too "goody-goody" to go down with the average voter, while the strength of Mayor Humes's campaign came from the solid prosperity achieved during his first administration. Party lines, questions of street and railway franchises, and all other issues except the attitude of the city toward saloons and gambling houses, were entirely eliminated. It is plain that a majority, a decided majority, of Seattle people are in favor of the present liberal policy. This was especially true of the business men, who voted for Mr. Humes almost in a body. Paradoxical as it may seem, in one or two precincts where church interests are strongest the vote was heaviest for the administration.

It may or may not be the result of this liberal and open policy toward those enterprises which are usually associated with disorder, but there has been an amazing increase in crime lately. Even the most enthusiastic advocate of the Humes regime realizes the necessity for action. The police force has quite recently been increased to meet the emergency, but anyone familiar with the city and the conditions prevailing knows that the addition of ten or twelve stars to the police force is not going to strike at the root of the evil. There has been talk of a change at the top; in fact, the detective force has lately been reorganized, and the chief of police may soon lose his official head. But the fault lies not with men but with methods. The police have been foolishly lax in the past, permitting half the bunco-men and light-fingered people in the West to make the town their headquarters. It is a compliment to the Queen City in one way; thieves flock only where there is plunder. But it is a poor advertisement, after all. A general clean-up is needed and needed at once, before the Cape Nome rush of this spring.

Telegraph Lines for Alaska.

IT WOULD seem as though the Pacific cable were to be anticipated by a Northern telegraph route, laid, for most of the way, on land. The Dominion government has begun the construction of a line from the railroad terminus at Quesnelle, B. C., to Atlin, B. C. At the last-named point, it will connect with the line already built to Dawson. Before the close of the year, Dawson and St. Michaels may also be connected, as Captain Abercrombie of the United States Army is exploring the Yukon for that very purpose. Within a year, it may be possible to send a message straight from New York to our most northern city. But this is not all. The terminus would be within a few hundred miles of the Siberian telegraph lines. Once connected, the telegraphic belt around the world would be completed. Strangely enough, this is the very plan adopted by the Western Union Company forty years ago, and frus- trated by the laying of the Atlantic cable; in many cases, these new lines follow the old Western Union surveys. Had this project anticipated the Pacific cable, there is no doubt that the discovery of gold in Alaska would have been made many years ago.

Nor is this all. Another quarter of a century will in all probability see the land portion of the world belted by rail-roads. It is regarded as morally certain that as soon as the White Pass and Yukon is completed into Dawson, American enterprise will push the line on to the mouth of that great river which is to the North what the Mississippi is of the West. By the time the locomotive whistle is heard in St. Michaels, the Trans-Siberian will have pushed out to the coast opposite, and a short steamer voyage will take passengers and freight from one line to the other. Summer journeys to St. Petersburg via St. Michaels will be on the tourist routes in 1925. Few except experts realize the energy, pluck and adaptability needed in this Arctic railroad construction. I remember that when the D.& R.G. "air line" was pushed through the Royal Gorge of Colorado up to the mining towns of Leadville and Aspen two miles above sea level, it was considered an engineering feat almost unique. The constructors of the White Pass and Yukon are fighting against physical conditions almost as hard, and they are doing it in an arctic climate and thousands of miles away from a base of supplies. The history of the road, if it is ever written, will be of absorbing interest.

Bryan Coming to the Coast.

THE leader of the Democracy, it seems, is to visit Washington and incidentally Seattle on an oratory tour. Doubtless, he will descend into Portland and subsequently to San Francisco before returning to Nebraska. There is no denying that the candidate attracts audiences wherever he goeth, though I doubt if his ministrations will be of much effect in Washington, where the fever of expansion is even stronger than in California. Whatever free silver sentiment existed there in the olden days has vanished before the glowing potentialities of Oriental trade, which is realized up there as the Coast's great opportunity.

Episodes of Life in Manila.

WE ARE an off-shoot of the race whose soldiers danced on the night before Waterloo. Before our army was in this heathen country two weeks, before we had even taken the city, we were instituting a species of society, grouped around the very few women available. In the long days between our occupation and that historical Feb. 4, more women came, and Manila organized a kind of society which was not a half-bad imitation. All through the black days of the first insurgent campaign, the young officers held in leash in Manila and the anxious women waiting in quarters beguiled their eagerness and their anxiety with balls and receptions. When the Fourth of July came—the double anniversary of the nation's birthday and of the smashing of Cervera—there were at least a dozen social functions to celebrate the day. The high official set attended a reception given by Admiral Dewey on the flagship, or a ball at the home of Colonel McCoy of the First Colorado; a little lower down in rank, the younger officers had a few functions of their own with ladies of the Spanish colony in attendance; and the rank and file had half-a-dozen big, happy "blow-outs" with native or mestizo ladies as belles of the occasion. There was then, there is yet, a fearful dearth of white women. 'Tis like an old-time mining camp, for all the world. If you know any white woman about to visit the far East, for goodness sake persuade her to take in Manila and give her letters of introduction.

Balls, receptions, dinners, drives, when it was cool, and the races—these have been our only social chances until recently. But now we have tennis courts and are actually talking of golf links! When an enterprising lieutenant staked out the first court and fitted it up with trappings brought all the way from West Point, the Spaniards shook their heads and said things about suicide. Now we have demonstrated in practice that exercise, if taken in moderation and at the right time, is harmless and even beneficial. As for golf, the chances are uncertain. The soil is not specially fitted for the sport, and keeping sod in condition would be an extremely expensive thing. Besides that, the heavy floods of the rainy season would tear up the ground so that the work would have to be done over again in the spring. Nevertheless, the enthusiasts in the army and navy declare that they will have a try at it when the coming rainy season is over. Meanwhile, the tennis courts are crowded morning and evening, and the Spanish colony looks on and wonders why we don't drop dead.

Quite the most interesting social affair native to this country is a mestizo ball. These functions, which always occur on Sunday, begin at ten o'clock in the morning and last until dawn next day—providing the military governor gives permission. There is an air of overwhelming politeness about the affair which suggests a negro cake-walk. The ladies drsse in their beautiful mestizo costumes, heavy with embroidery; the men wear the "real thing" in the way of European clothes. Homely as are the native women, the half-breeds are more often than not handsome, and even the men are not entirely insignificant. But how, in this climate, they manage to keep dancing from the morning of one day to cock-crow of the next, and that without missing one number, is a mystery to an American, who is glad to "sit out" every other dance at an ordinary officers' ball.

A FILIPINO FAMILY.

Uncle Sam has two queer prisoners on his hands. The first is Senora Aguinaldo, wife of the misguided insurgent-general and reported to be responsible for many of his best-laid plans. She looks anything but formidable as she sits by the windows of her detention quarters working over some of that interminable embroidery of the mestizo woman or weeping softly to herself, for she is still mourning the death of her little daughter, who succumbed to the hardships of the famous pursuit. The other prisoner, one Philippa Salvadora, is a puzzle to the authorities. He was picked up at Balinag and placed under detention at the instigation of the friars. It appears that he has been leading a Catholic reformation all by himself. About six months ago, he broke loose from the Roman Catholic Church, of which he had been a priest, and started to found a religion. He kept the Romish ritual and practices; he expressly stated that the only change was to be in enforcing stricter morals and abolishing church control. The propaganda spread until he had two thousand followers and had absorbed a goodly sum from the collections taken up at every service. He was arrested on suspicion that this money was used for illegal purposes, but no one came forward to prove that he had used it for anything except legitimate, charitable and church work. He is a large, fine-looking Filipino, with every indication of intellectual power and personal magnetism; even in detention, he continues to preach and exhort, spending his time, like St. Paul, in efforts to convert his guards. Yet, in spite of his evident innocence of selfish intent and his undoubted right to do as he pleases under American rule, the authorities fear to turn him loose for fear of offending the friars, who hold the balance of power in the islands and who have to be reckoned with at every turn. Under Spanish rule this evangelist would have been fined, tortured or killed, which fact may lead the friars to make unpleasant comparisons. So Salvadora remains in detention, arguing with his heretic guards.

A RICE FIELD.

We have two mining fevers going on at one and the same time. Gold furnishes the main craze. Rich veins, free and in quartz, are reported from the northern part of Luzon and from Mindanao. A party of twelve has just left for Vigan with provisions, arms and appliances. It is said that they are acting on a "tip" from native sources. Others will follow on the next steamer, and it is reported that a party is being organized to prospect in the Tiruray country of Mindanao. Active but quiet work is going on among the coal fields in the south of the archipelago. Practical mining engineers are looking over the ground in Cebu and Romblon. These fields lay close to the water, and can therefore be easily handled, while those in Luzon can never be taken out to the coast until railroad facilities are improved. This must come, of course, after the close of the Tagal rebellion, which, we all devoutly hope, is near to its end.

There is no end to the odd cases that are continually bobbing up in the criminal and police courts which have superseded the corrupt Spanish bluff at justice. A husband comes into court and requests a writ ordering his wife, who has left him because he beat her, to return to his bed and board; a Chinese murders his new-born child because it is a girl and not a boy; a score of native women are brought up in a bunch for gambling; a friar asks for an injunction restraining a Protestant missionary from operating in the city. But quite the oddest case on record is now before the probate court. One Alejandro Morena died recently and left a codical to his will giving $6,000 to the religious corporation of Manila, providing the friars released the soul of the testator's father from purgatory. Fernando Moreno, the natural heir, contests the probating of the will until such time as the friars show that they have performed their contract. The complaint, filed in all seriousness by the younger Moreno, calls on the friars to "show proof in open court that they are able to release from purgatory the soul of the aforesaid Fernando Moreno, or that they have communication with said abode of purgatory by which they may receive advices of the releasing of the soul of said Fernando Moreno, according to the terms of the contract, when that shall have been accomplished, etc., etc." The old gentleman has been dead over a quarter of a century

THE WORLD'S FUR SALE.

ANNUAL DISTRIBUTION OF PRECIOUS PELTRY IN LONDON.

I WAS a visitor, this week, at the greatest fur sale of the year, a virtual world's fair of the fur trade. It was the sale in London of the year's "clean-up" of the Hudson Bay Company and its allied concerns. Practically all the fur produced in the world comes to London for sale. There are three big auctions, sealskins going in December and beavers in January, but the big sale, the one which draws buyers out of all Caucasian regions from California to Russia, comes in March. The disposal of the accumulation of furs takes many days; I saw only the part of one. In the big commission houses, auctioneeers were rattling out the skins by bundles, by casks, by single pelts, and crowds of eager buyers were watching the bidding and chipping in a bid themselves, now and then. It was a keen, energetic set of men of a sort not common in England, and bids flew fast. But, after all, it was not so different from the ordinary auction that it merits special description. So I put in my time circulating through the crowd and learning something about the fur trade in general and the London fur sales in particular.

These sales were originated by the Hudson Bay Company, in the time when that famous syndicate was an empire in itself, and gradually attracted the smaller producers. Great commission firms handle the bidding. These commission merchants have the safe and sure end of the business. The risk comes on the buyers. For many days before the actual sale, these worthies overrun the commission houses, sampling the skins. It is impossible to go over a whole lot, which may comprise many thousands, looking for flaws in each separate piece. It is an example in praise of British commercial honesty that buyers depend absolutely on samples picked at random from the bales and casks. Flaws and imperfections are of many sorts; it is a wise furrier who knows them all. Most often the imperfection comes from some mistake in caring for the skin when it is first removed. In sealskin, for example, the disposition of mind and body which exists in the brute at the time of his death has much to do with the case. These skins are obtained by driving the bull seal s awayfrom the herd; they are then knocked in the head and skinned. If the beasts are driven to their death too fast, the quality of the skin is injured, and if there is delay in stripping and pickling the skins,decomposition sets in,showing its presence by minute pink spots, which mark a place where the hair will fall out later in the game. When a cask of this spotted fur is found, the commission merchants show perfect honesty in selecting samples which are of average quality. Very valuable furs,like sea otter, silver fox and Russian sable, are sold by the separate skin and so examined.

On the day of the sales, the buyers to the number of perhaps four hundred assemble in their regular seats in the great commercial salesroom. No law but custom regulates the disposal of these seats, yet the same men occupy the same positions through a lifetime and, dying, will them to their heirs or their partners. The big buyers are closely watched by the smaller fry for upon them depends the pace of the sale. The auctioneer begins with some small, universally saleable skin, such as Hudson Bay sable, and the sale proceeds slowly. Gradually, as bid after bid is recorded, interest wakes up. Finally,when there preliminary parcels are disposed of and the sealskins reached, the fun begins. The buyer of the first lot has a right to take as many as he wishes of the goods of that grade at the same price. The auctioneer rattles off the succeeding lots to his bid, until his needs or his capital are exhausted; then the market is open again, and the others chip in. The bidding grows furious. On the day of my visit, I left the crowd in a state resembling the Chicago wheat pit. There is no more exciting auction in the world, and no shrewder, quicker lot of buyers. A man must keep his wits about him, think fast, bid fast, or lose his chances. He must be able to make lightning judgment, and woe to him who bids for his firm a farthing over the average price!

The figures of this sale are enormous. For instance, 230,000 skunk skins went under the hammer. There were also 219,000 minks, 717,000 muskrats, 60,000 red foxes and 64,000 opossums butchered to make this London auction. The biggest buyers are the French and Russians, who purchase especially heavy lots of sea otter, sable, silver fox and the other finer furs. I learned that the French care little for sealskins and the Russians nothing at all. It is in America that this fur holds its great popularity.

In fact, the sealskin sale of last December was greatly influenced by conditions prevailing in America. It was the liveliest fur sale London has ever seen. Prices rose eighty per cent, and even old and experienced buyers were bewildered by the conditions. The barring of northwestern sealskins, those captured upon forbidden ground, was at the bottom of the trouble. It appears that this shut off, so far as Americans were concerned, all but the Alaskan supply. Nevertheless, the Americans must have their sealskins. There were 77,000 sealskins taken last year, but only one-third were of the high-priced Alaskan variety. Yet Americans were bound to have what they wanted, and as a consequence the Alaskan prices went up until they were nearly doubled. Yet, in the end, the bulk of the Alaskan pelts were taken by firms from the United States.

Although it involves a great loss, owing to tariff discriminations, the great bulk of sealskins bought for America are dyed in England. Undyed sealskins are admitted free, while dyed ones pay a twenty per cent duty. But the English can do it well, and we cannot. Difference in water, secret processes and other mysterious reasons have been advanced, but the real cause, without doubt, lies in better and more thorough processes. Whatever the reason may be, a sealskin must go from Alaska to London to be dyed before it can be made into a garment in New York or San Francisco. We have nothing to be ashamed of, because we invented the process which makes sealskins of use. In a state of nature the smooth, soft under hair which gives value to a sealskin, is covered over by a growth of long bristles which won't take dye. All sorts of methods of ridding the fur of this undesirable coat were tried in vain, until a New York man conceived the idea of running a heavy blast of air over the surface so as to "lay" the soft under hair, and then clipping the bristles by hand. Later, he made a machine do the same work and the process was complete.

The price was high, this year, for every sort of skin, an indication of a gradually lessening supply. Russian and French bidding forced silver fox up to $1,950 for a single skin—think of it, and consider the size of a fox! Sea otter came to $1,300 a skin. Russian sable sold in lots at $235 the skin. It is only a question when some of these, the silver fox, for example, drops out of the market entirely through extinction of the species.

Commercial Chemistry.

A Clever Process for Separating Air Into Its Elements.

IN THIS age, which is skeptical concerning all the things of the spirit and over-incredulous regarding the things of the flesh, we are always ready to accept the latest discovery of applied science as a wonder, with enormous and infinite possibilities. Therefore, when liquid air began to be produced in commercial quantities, the country "bit at" everything which was claimed for the new substance. It has now been in use nearly a year, and we are learning that some of these claims were true and many others counterfeit. For example, it was asserted that it would prove a valuable motive-power. This is not true; practical experiment has shown that it is worth less for this purpose than steam, water, electricity or the other common motors. Its one value in this respect lies in the lightness of the fuel and machinery, adapting it to a few specialized uses. Tinkers of flying-machines, for example, recognize it as a boon. It was heralded as a great anæsthetic agent in surgery, yet a year of trial has convinced surgeons that it is less useful than recognized anæsthetics in ordinary cases, but is of great use in a few special operations. So it goes. It is a great and valuable discovery, but not nearly so available as we believed in the first flush of discovery. It will be remembered that the same over-expectancy occurred when the X-rays were first discovered.

Therefore, it is well to take a conservative view of a new process lately brought out, by which liquid air may be produced at a small fraction of its former cost, and by which pure oxygen, nitrogen and carbonic acid gas may be separated easily and in such quantities that they may be used for commercial purposes. The process, scientists say, is so simple that it is a wonder that no one discovered it before. Reduced to terms of an unscientific understanding,it consists in letting a mass of liquid air act as the motor-power in making more liquid air until the machinery runs down The principle is very much like that by which an automatic gun is operated—the recoil of the explosions operating the loading and firing mechanism. The inventors call their system "the self-intensification of cold." In [illegible] tific terms, the process may be described as foll[illegible] air passes through a system of coiled pipes in the [illegible] of a tank. These pipes are arranged in tiers and form a dividing wall, which separates the tank into two chambers. A portion of the air brought from the compressors is released at high pressure and is allowed to flow through the interior of the pipes. The fall in temperature accompanying the expansion serves to reduce the air within the pipes to the degree of cold necessary for liquefaction. In other words, the expansion of air outside the pipes is employed to bring the air inside the pipes to a liquid state. The advantage of the system lies in the fact that after the production of liquid air at the ordinary pressure of 1,250 pounds has gone on for a time, this air, without any other motive power whatever, will continue to produce more air until the pressure runs down to fifteen pounds. It is very near to perpetual motion. A compressor run for one day at 1,250 pounds pressure will go on making air for a year.

It was stated at the time when liquid air was first produced in commercial quantities, that one great use of the discovery would be the easy isolation of pure oxygen and nitrogen. Air, as every schoolboy knows, is not a chemical compound. The two elements exist together, but are not fused to make one substance. When air is reduced to an extremely low temperature, the oxygen becomes heavy more rapidly than the nitrogen, so that it sinks to the bottom while the carbonic acid gas, which forms an impurity of most air, becomes heavy most rapidly of all. Also, at certain temperatures the nitrogen and carbonic acid in air evaporate and pass into the surrounding atmosphere. Therefore, when it is desired to separate the three, the liquified air is left in a closed vessel with a small tube at top and bottom leading to receivers. The nitrogen passes upward in the form of gas, to be liquified again in the receiver; the carbonic acid gas drips away at the bottom. Thus, the three elements are isolated, with no trouble except the holding of the liquid air at a certain temperature.

All this means that pure oxygen, nitrogen and carbonic acid gas may be placed on the market at a cost comparatively trifling. For the two last-named there is very little need as yet, but new uses will undoubtedly be discovered as time goes on. For oxygen, now that it is produced in commercial quantities, there is an important use. Every schoolboy knows that it is the oxygen in the air which makes things burn. Every one who has studied science knows that a burning match thrust into oxygen will blaze up with redoubled intensity, and that a live coal so placed will burst into flame. A blast of oxygen blown into a furnace will produce a heat up to any required intensity. Indeed, it can fairly melt an ordinary furnace. Engineers and naval constructors have known these many years that if oxygen were ever produced in cheap commercial quantity the speed of locomotives and steamships could be increased over forty per cent. That time has now come. Oxygen in liquid form, occupying but little space, may be stored on every locomotive and steamship, and will run furnaces and boilers at such heat that the heaviest forced draught is as nothing. This is only one field of possible usefulness, but it is a broad one.

This renews an anxiety felt by the world when liquid air was first used. Will the new invention take the oxygen out of the air? It has been shown that in the ordinary uses of liquid air there is no more danger than there is that the water the world bathes in every morning will dry up the ocean. Air it is, and when it passes out of the liquid state it is air again. But the wholesale consumption of oxygen which would follow its general use as a fuel, is a different proposition. It is not so much that it would exhaust the life-giving gas in the great atmospheric envelope around the globe, although that might happen after ages and ages. It is that a great number of oxygen-generators which would stand in a large city, or wherever there might be engines and manufactories, would keep the surrounding air weak and vitiated.

F. NIXON

Dr. Howard A. Kelly of Johns Hopkins University,a high authority on reptiles, was recently bitten on the finger by a rattlesnake in his collection. Being a man naturally quick of movement, he drew away his finger before the second movement of a snake bite, the evacuation of poison could take place. As a result, he suffered no more inconvenience than would have been inflicted by the prick of a pin. Dr. Kelly believes that more people have been killed by the whiskey given as an antidote for rattlesnake bites than by the bites themselves. Rarely is less than a quart administered, and a quart of whisky is pretty sure to be fatal to a person in health, while there is nothing in rattlesnake venom which makes it an antidote for whisky.

and must now be out of purgatory if he ever expects to be; nevertheless, the friars have not yet been able to produce the records of the place to prove his release. They can probably show that they have performed the required number of masses, which would have been all-sufficient under Spanish rule, but Americans are more skeptical. Peculiar as this case is, it is said to be only a test for a great number of others. A Californian tells me that such a will came up in his own state in the early days and was broken by the court.

VICTORIA-B·C· BY J·GORDON SPRING

Corridor in the Parliament Building, Victoria, B. C.

VICTORIA—the most westerly city of the Dominion and the Empire—is justly entitled to be called the "Queen City of the West." As it nestles on the sunny sides of the Straits of San Juan de Fuca itsbeauty is obvious. Such continuous splendor as that of this gateway of the Pacific can be viewed at no other place in the northwest. Here is every variety of scenery from the calm and pleasing pastoral to the stern and majestic grandeur of mountain and sea.

As the visitor enters the little land-locked harbor he is at once impressed with the beauty of the surrounding landscape, as well as with the sightly buil lings of the city itself. Rising gradually from the water-front the grades extending through the business section of the city to the suburbs are unmarred by declivities or rough breaks. The picturesque harbor is dotted with as much of its extensive shipping—which includes the largest sealing fleet in the world—as is 'at home." To the right is James Bay with its flotilla of yachts and its club-houses, and beyond rises that imposing pile—the Government buildings. Further still are the wooded slopes, the charming drive-ways, and the drift-piled beaches of Beacon Hill Park—three hundred acres of scenic beauty. Close at hand to the left the business blocks crowd the slopes and even in their compact arrangement they charm the eye. Beyond, standing prominently on a pretty green height, is Dunsmuir Castle, and a number of pretty residences are perched around it. Turning still more to the left two bridges are seen reaching to the Indian reserve. Beyond them a forest of schooner masts, with the smoke of the saw-mill and manufactory chimneys for a background. Westward, the fortified arm of Point Macaulay, with its mysterious cavern-held artillery, juts out to sea, and in a splendidly sheltered harbor beyond is Esquimalt with its armed hills, docks and fleets, which guard the interests of Her Majesty in the Pacific.

It is to its own natural advantages, which were apparent to intelligent observers even before the axe had been laid to the first pine on its site, that Victoria owes not only its birth, but its growth in population—thirty thousand in less than fifty years,exclusive of Asiatics and Indians—its wealth, and commercial importance. It has no railway crossing a continent to give it life and commerce. No artificial advantages, no brilliant picturing of its location or the salubrity of its climate, no advertising of the monster riches of the virgin mines and forests of the contiguous country, or the wealth of the near-by waters, are to be thanked by Victorians for the importance now attained by the city. Victoria, is now about half a century old. In 1840 it was thought prudent by the Hudson's Bay Company to prepare for the removal of their headquarters on the Columbia to some point on the seaboard in British territory. After full examination and careful deliberation, they decided to choose the site at Camusen, where the city of Victoria now stands. The first city was enclosed in a palisaded enclosure, a hundred feet square. There were in all eight log houses, bastions, etc., and here the fur traders made their home and watched the horizon at Race rocks for the ships that brought stores and news from England. For three years, until 1846, the settlement went under the name of Camusen,and then it became Fort Victoria. Soon the days of the fur trader, in a measure, passed, and the gold seeker came, and with his coming Victoria grew. In 1852 the city was surveyed and laid out in streets and lots, its boundaries then being the harbor on the west, the present Government street on the east, Johnson street on the north, and Fort street on the south—a block which comprises a very small portion of its present business section. Between the years 1859 and 1866 marked progress was made in and around the city of Victoria. Building operations and improvements were carried on everywhere. In 1862 it is estimated that at least fifteen hundred substantial buildings had been erected, where but two or three years previously the forest had stood. The same year the city was incorporated with a white population of over thirty-five hundred. A year later it had increased to six thousand, exclusive of the large number of miners who made it their winter headquarters.

It was the discovery of gold that built up the city of Victoria. With the influx of the army of argonauts, who poured into Victoria in their hundreds and thousands, outfitted themselves, and passed on to the Fraser, then later to Cariboo, then to the Cassiar, the real history of Victoria and the province of British Columbia, of which it is the capital, begins. The history of Victoria is the history of many places in the West and in the North. The village became a city, first of tents, then of log cabins and later of more substantial buildings. After the rush to the Fraser came the reaction and the great population was reduced considerably. Then came news of the discovery of gold in Cariboo, and an even greater rush than to the Fraser took place, and while the excitement was at its height, Victoria was again the home of a population of immense proportions and constantly changing character. Then came another reaction, and many obstacles which severely tried the rising city, but its citizens were then as now. They had faith in the city and worked to bring it safely through the crisis, and they did.

Then commenced the steady growth, which to-day still goes on. In 1891, after twenty-three years of prosperity and slackness, of excitement and calms, people coming and going, the population was but sixty-eight hundred. Ten years later the census gave the city a population of twenty-three thousand, and to-day it is over thirty thousand, exclusive of the Asiatics and Indians. To-day it is the social, political and commercial capital of the province—the wealthiest city of its size on the American continent.

Its streets as they are seen to-day are wide and handsome. Government, Fort Yates, Douglas, and Johnson streets are all bustling commercial thoroughfares. A vast amount of business is also transacted daily, with very little show, on Wharf street, the mart of the wholesalers. Government street was the first street of the city and continues its chief thoroughfare. Douglas street, with its massive blocks of brick and stone, is rapidly attaining a rival prominence. On each and every one of the business streets are buildings of imposing design and modern arrangement, and while unlike Chicago, there are no "sky-scrapers," yet many of Victoria's buildings would present a creditable appearance in any city.

The same may be said of the wealthier residence portion of the city. It would be difficult to find more elegant residences anywhere in the Northwest than those along Belcher, Upper Fort, Cadbora and Oak Bay roads, Rockland avenue, the Gorge and Esquimalt roads, and half a dozen other streets of similar attractiveness. Like a jewel, each residence is set in the midst of well-appointed and well-cared, for grounds, and the taste of the owners is apparent in the beauty of their home surroundings as well as in the architecture of the buildings themselves. The streets too, are all of sufficient width to enhance the architectural effect, and an ample water supply keeps the lawns fresh and green.

Of the church buildings probably the most prominent are: the Pandora Street Methodist Church, a magnificent stone structure; St. Andrews, Roman Catholic Cathedral, a handsome pile of brick and stone; St. Andrews Presbyterian Church; Reformed Episcopal Church, and Christ Church Cathedral, from the tower of which the panoramic view of the city, which is published in this number, was taken. Of the school buildings the most prominent are the Central and High School buildings, three in number, which stand on a ten-acre campus at the head of Yates street. Of the public buildings there is that magnificent architectural monument—the Parliament buildings—the stone used in which is all from the quarries of the province. Post Office and Customs Building, a handsome grey sandstone block, ornaments Government street. The stone used in this building is also from the quarries near-by. The City Hall is a brick block, which was built at a cost of about $160,000, and includes the general municipal offices and chamber, the police barracks, lock-up and court, public library and reading rooms.

There are three hospitals: the Provincial Royal Jubilee, a gift from the citizens in honor of Her Majesty's Jubilee year in 1887, which stands back in commodious grounds on Cadbora Bay Road and which cost $55,000; St. Joseph's hospital, which stands facing the convent of St. Anne on Humboldt street, and the Marine hospital on the promontory across the harbor and adjoining the government reserve. This hospital, which is solely for the merchant marine, is owned by the Dominion government and supported by a collection of proportionate tonnage on all, vessels entering the port.

Looking over the business section of Victoria it is easy to be seen that buildings have been erected only to supply an existing demand, rather than prospective, and here is shown the conservativeness of Victorians, which has placed the credit of the city on such firm basis. So high indeed is the credit of the city of Victoria that not long ago, when the municipal council brought about a consolidation of the municipal loans, they were able to place their debentures, amounting to $210,000 with a life of twenty years and bearing 4 per cent interest, at ¼ per cent above par, and it should be noted that the purchas ers were a financial firm belonging to the city—the British Columbia Land & Investment Company.

As a place of residence, Victoria offers attractions that can be presented by no other city in the province. It is not only the political and commercial capital, but also the so cial capital. Here are the Parliament buildings, courts and Government offices; here are the headquarters of Her Majesty's fleet in the North Pacific, as well as of "C Battery, R. C. A.," and the Engineers and Sappers of Work Point, where, by the way, the Dominion and Imperial authorities propose to establish at great expense a large militia depot, the Dominion alone contributing $120,000 per year. The officers of every branch of the service are ever ready to assist in any festivity and their presence tends materially to the success of the social pleasures of the city. Victoria's society is of the highest order, and fully equal to that of any city on the American continent. Everybody has the privileges of good education, and the almost universal ownership of homes with attractive surroundings, in the nature of things, beget an increasd refinement. Victorians are proverbial for an easy distribution of tim between desk or bench and home; their lives are a division between labor and pleasure. Victoria has three well-appointed clubs, which have the stamp of true hospitality in their every detail. There are, too, many athletic clubs, for Victorians take great interest in football and cricket—they being an English people—and tennis, yachting, lacrosse, golf, rowing, hunting, cycling and horse-racing. The Masonic, Odd Fellows, Foresters, Workmen and other secret societies are well represented. In fact, taking all in all, Victorians are a very social people.

No visit to Victoria is complete which does not embrace the tour of Beacon Hill Park. This park has few riv[illegible] the continent. There are about three hundred acres, wooded in part, aud intersected with carriage-drives li[illegible] by royal old oaks, over whose heads many centuries have passed. Two or three miniature lakes, bordered by green lawns and pebbly beaches, are the home of a choice collection of waterfowl, while in the dear park and bear pit are to be found specimens of the many animals and birds native to th province. Thee sides of Beacon Hill proper afford a recreation ground, where, for nine or ten months out of theyear, the athletes of the cityare to be found daily. In the summer time thousands meet under the spreading trees and sit in the leafy bowers, listening to the music of the local bands.

From the summit of Beacon Hill the enlarged horizon gives the sightseer an ethereal vision. Looking northward, the city is stretched out like a panorama, andi the background swells the rounded contour of Cedar Hill and Mt. Tolmie. Westward, the harbor with its wharves and masts is stretched at the feet like a Flemish etching, and southward the observer looks, across a mirror twenty miles wide, the calm straits of Fuce, to the Washington shore, where, drawn close to the lens of a crystalline atmosphere, the snow-capped Olympics rise peak on peak, while away in the furthest distance on either hand, the sky and water meet. It is a beauty full of color and variety, for the landscape ranges over a whole gamut of effects—mountain, marsh, foliage, lake and sea. Here comes the Victorian when jaded by business or other cares, touches mother earth, and grows strong again.

There is some talk of another park at the head of Pandora street, and also one in the western suburb, and a syndicate, locally represented by H. Croft, has secured an option from the city for the tranformation of James bay tide-flats into a recreation park, the attractions of which are to include a large theatre, a cinder track for cycle and foot races, a green for lacross and other sports, with a large grand-stand, horticultural gardens, bowling alley, etc.

Of the other attractions to the visitor in and about the city of Victoria, the Gorge, where there is a most picturesque waterfall, formed by the incoming and outgoing tides, is one which has been made widely known through the art of the camera and brush. The Gorge is situate on Victoria Arm, an inlet which runs in four or five miles from the sea. Here is another natural park. On this arm Victorians are to be seen in throngs on every summer night in canoes, and everything propelled with oars, naptha or steam; and here are held the regattas, which these most patriotic people hold to celebrate the birthday of the Queen.

Beautiful drives extend to the sea in many directions—to Goldsream, to Esquimalt, where, in one of the best sheltered harbors of the world, the British naval fleets are found, and where, too, is a dock capable of holding any vessel on the Pacific, marine ways for the accommodation of the merchant marine, and other industries, which because of their uniqueness, are attractive to tourists. Oak Bay too, is a popular resort, where latterly many citizens are making their homes. Here is situated one of the best summer hotels on the nor'hern coast.

So much for what Victoria offers to the tourist. Let us look at what the city can show to the men of commerce. She has harbor accommodations that are unsurpassed. By the expenditure of hundreds of thousands of dollars, private enterprise has constructed at the entrance to the harbor proper, docks capable of accommodating and sheltering in the roughest gale that blows the largest steamers and sailing vessels to be found upon the waters of the Pacific. Their course from the ocean is a clear one, there being no dangerous or tortuous channels, and no shoals or rocks. At this outer dock, for which Mr. R. P. Rithet deserves the gratitude of Victorians, abundant water and excellent wharfage is afforded for shipping of any draught. The shore line of Victoria harbor, which is entirely protected by the natural conformation of the land, is about seven miles in length. Well appointed wharves extend for over a mile in almost unbroken succession, and there are a number of private wharves. The majority of the wharves are lighted by electricity and provided with modern appliances for the quick dispatch of business.

An elaborate scheme of harbor improvement, in perfecting which, Mr. Thomas C. Sorby, F. R. G. S., has spent many of the best years of his life, is now before the city and the Dominion Government, which will make the harbor and shipping facilities of Victoria such as will be unsurpassed by any city on the coast, if not on the continent.

Mr. Sorby's proposal is to close the lower harbor by temporary dams, to pump out the water, hydraulic and excavate an area of about 107 acres to a depth of 30 feet, enclosing it with a wall built up of the rocks now impeding navigation, and filling in the balance behind with the waste excavated material, thus reclaiming about 104 acres of land, exclusive of that the upper harbor, that it would become some of the most valuable property in the city. This reclaimed land in the upper and lower harbor will, together, have a frontage towards the water of about five miles. Very little material would be required in the construction of the work beyond that now actually lying at the bottom of the harbor. There is enough rock and boulder to build the most substantial walls round the lower harbor, and sand, gravel and mud to fill in behind these walls to a height of about four feet above ordinary high water mark. The granite for the coping is the only stone required to be brought from the outside.

In addition to these works, the harbor would be deepened, coal bunkers and spacious dry docks would be constructed, the wharves equipped with hydraulic cranes and capstans and ware houses built as demand arose. The scheme is not speculative. The funds are available awaiting the act of incorporation and the required guarantees of interest and repayment. The total cost is estimated at four and one-half million dollars.

Victoria's wharves are scarcely ever empty, for not only is this port the gateway of the Dominion trade with the far east from Singapore to Saghalien, but it is also the key to the fast growing trade with Australasia, Polynesia, Hawaii and Alaska, in fact with all the countries washed by the Pacific. Then again, it is the headquarters of the seal-hunting, the salmon-canning, and the deep sea fishing industries, each of which contributes materially to the prosperity of its citizens. It is the home of the leading exporters and wholesale merchants of the province, and the vast volume of its foreign imports is almost balanced by the contributions to the markets of the world which its productive industries make possible. During the year ending June last alone, the exports from the city of Victoria reached a total valuation of $3,050,529, compared with $2,335,065 in the year before, and the exports $2,610,794, compared with $2,388,571 in the year previous.

Two specially prominent features of Victoria's trade are unique to that city—sealing and salmon canning. Here the world's headquarters for both industries are found. Both were created, nurtured and developed by the enterprise of the business men of Victoria, and it is but natural that the citizens point with pride to them. The salmon canners are constantly looking for new fields for their enterprise, and now that the value of the streams of the west coast of Vancouver Island has become apparent, they are establishing canneries there, and last year Clayoquot contributed 4,350 cases to the total pack of 484,161 cases. To show the vast proportion of these industries, a recapitulation made of the value of the fisheries for the year prior to the last gives a grand total of $6,138,864 90. The capital invested in the salmon industry is placed at $2,350,260, and with the $200,000 odd invested in the sealing industry, the capital invested in both industries, which give employment to over twenty thousand men, is over two and a half millions of dollars.

Another great trade which brings millions of dollars to the coffers of Victoria firms is the lumber trade, which finds employment for monster fleets of sailing ships and big ocean-going tramps, some carrying over three million feet of rough lumber to the Chinese and other Oriental markets, and to the British, South African and American, and other consumers in various parts of the world. Year by year this trade is growing, and so great is the demand at Chemainus mills, that they are obliged to build another mill, construction of which will be shortly commenced, to fill their orders. Other mills also tell of great demands on them. To show how the trade is increasing, the lumber cut during 1898 exceeded that of the year before by about nineteen million feet, and when the returns are in this year, another big advance will be noted. The scarcity of tonnage and the incidental high rates alone are militating against this industry.

Of the shipping which calls Victoria its home port there are the steamers of the Canadian Pacific Navigation Company, whose head offices are here. One of the most palatial steamers of this company leaves this city at 7 a. m. and returns shortly after 6 p. m., giving a daily ferry service to Vancouver connecting with the Canadian Pacific Railway. This company controls a vast fleet plying to the west coast of Vancouver Island, to northern British Columbia ports, the keys to the Cassiar and Omineca mining districts, to the canneries, and to the ports of Skaguay and St. Michaels, carrying the gold-seeker and merchant and their effects. They, too, have a service of stern wheelers on the Fraser river. The steamer Victorian, named after this city, gives a daily connection with the Northern Pacific and Great Northern and southern systems at Seattle and Tacoma. The Garland gives a tri-weekly service, the City of Nanaimo plies to the gulf and adjacent islands and a new steamer is being built to run to Gulf islands. So much for the coasting and local trade. The three Empresses of the Canadian Pacific Railway give a tri weekly service to Japan and China, while a fleet of six Northern Pacific liners and three steamers of the N. Y. K. Company (Japanese Mail S. S. Company) give a much more frequent service. Victoria is the first point of call and departure for all these vessels, and few days pass without one or more big liners being at her wharves. Three well appointed liners run monthly to the antipodes, via Honolulu, and there are other local vessels in the Cape Nome and coal freighting trades. There are, too, many lumber tramps and sailing vessels, including between sixty and seventy sealing schooners, as well as other craft, which call Victoria their home port.

Foreign trade and manufacturing, however, can be no index to the large amount of business transacted between Victoria's wholesalers and the interior towns of the island and mainland, all of which draw their supplies from the capital. The mining districts must import their provisions and machinery; the salmon canners must be kept in tin and other materials of the industry; the sealing fleet must be fitted out annually and vessels built here; and to meet these requirements demands a liberal use of capital, which is returned with interest, in the products of the mines and the canneries and the catch of the sealing schooners brought home in the fall.

Although the city is less widely known as a manufacturing than as a shipping and distributing point, Victoria is not without industrial institutions whose product commands a ready sale abroad. One by one, unostentatiously but continually, manufacturing establishments are being added to the list until the catalogue is now a large one. There is the Albion Iron Works, where anything from rivets to steamships can be secured, chemical works, flour and rice mills, paint factories, breweries, several large furniture factories, fruit-preserving and spice works, some half dozen or more ship-yards, carriage, boot-and-shoe, powder, and other works, saw mills, sash factories and planing mills, and a long list of others, which were they to be enumerated would fill much space. All of which goes to show that Victoria is not only a summer and health resort, a great shipping point and the headquarters of many industries, but also a great producing point.

Victoria at no greatly distant date bids fair, too, to become a smelting centre. Not only is it likely, with the opening up of the rich quartz district of the Kootenay and other mining districts, now difficult of access, that the ore will be sent to Victoria to be smelted, but here, at the doors of the city, as it were, are rich ledges of gold-bearing rock, of iron and copper. On this island and the adjacent islands lying between it and the mainland many rich claims have been located. While Victoria stands intimately related to these, it is even more so to the promising properties at her very threshold, at Goldstream, but twelve miles away, at Alberni, and in all that district which intervenes along the west coast to Cape Cormorell at the northern extremity of the island, where a company is now engaged in washing black sand. The Hayes mine at Alberni, the Three W's, the Seattle group at Clayoquot, the black sand deposits of Wreck Bay, and the hundreds of other wealthy properties of the coast, to say nothing of the rich mines at Goldstream, one of which is to be disposed of to a San Francisco capitalist, promise well for the mining outlook of Victoria.

Besides the precious metals, the iron and the copper of the valleys and hills, Vancouver Island possesses valuable coal lands, the development of which has already played a great part in Victoria's industrial life, and is destined to be of still greater value. The groups of mines of the Dunsmuirs and the New Vancouver Coal Company, at a distance of not over 75 miles from Victoria, give employment to thousands of men and many vessels. At Comox is a field of coal 200 miles squares and estimated to contain workable coals to the enormous extent of sixteen million tons per square mile. Then, too, big seams are being developed by a San Francisco company on Quatsino Sound, and deposits of bituminous coal have been found on the Queen Charlotte Islands.

Of the railways entering Victoria, the Esquimalt and Nanaimo line opens up valuable lands between the city and the coal mines. It was built by Hon. Robert Dunsmuir in 1886, the Dominion government giving a grant of $750,000 towards the cost and the Province a reserve of two million acres of land. This line, and for that matter the Victoria and Sidney Railroad also, is regarded by many as a link in a through transcontinental line, and in this connection it is to be observed that there has been a plethora of transcontinental railway and ferry schemes before the people of Victoria during the past few years. There was a proposal from the promoters of the Port Angeles and Eastern Railway for a ferry service to connect Victoria with their line, which was to touch one or more of the large through systems at Olympia. By the terms of this proposal Victorians were asked to pay a bonus of $17,500, afterwards reduced to $12,000 and lower, but even then the citizens considered it too high and refused it. Coincidently came an offer from Mr. Dunsmuir for a fast ferry service to Vancouver, but this was afterwards withdrawn. Then there was agitation for the city to take some $500,000 worth of the stock of the Victoria, Vancouver and Eastern Railway, which has a charter to build a line up the Chilliwack valley crossing the larger through stems, connection with which was to be made from Victoria via the Victoria and Sidney Railroad to Sydney, and thence by fast ferry to Point Roberts. The voice of the people will be heard on this scheme this week. Another scheme is also on the tapis for a line in extension of the Eastern and Northern line to Hardy Bay, which would open up the northern portion of the island.

Victoria possesses an extensive system of water works, operated by the corporation, which, with the well-equipped and efficient fire department, reduces fire risks to a minimum. The city's water supply comes from a number of spring-fed lakes, which after passing over filter beds is distributed through steel mains, thus insuring purity. Improvements have been made in this system from year and to year and it is now approaching perfection. The sewerage of the city is upon the separate system, the general scheme being as recommended by the eminent New York engineer, Mr. Rudolph Herring. All the sewage is carried far out to sea by the tide.

The electric railway system of the city has been in operation since 1890, under the management of the British Columbia Electric Ry. Co. It was the third line constructed west of the Mississippi—the second in Canada. It gives a quick service through the city and to the suburbs of Esquimalt, Oak Bay, Victoria West, Spring Ridge, Beacon Hill, etc. An excellent telephone service is enjoyed by the city, and in a few months a long distance telephone cable will be laid connecting the city with Nanaimo, Vancouver and New Westminster. Both telegraph lines entering the city do considerable business.

The climate of Victoria compares very favorably with that of California, and has been more generally contrasted with that of the south of England. It is temperate at all seasons of the year, the heat of the summer being softened by breezes from mountain or sea. The heat is never oppressive, and the warmest days of summer are followed by cool and delightful evenings. The winter's rains—snow is seldom seen—when properly provided against, are not unhealthy; in fact the longevity of Victorians testifies to the health-preserving qualities of the climate.

There ne d be no dull day in a stay of many weeks in Victoria, nor any day in which profit may not be conviently combined with amusement. Here the yachtsman finds ideally beautiful waters; the cyclist or horseman has the choice of a number of well-kept and pretty roads; the angler often takes kingly salmon from within a few yards of the wharves at the harbor entrance; and in the lakes and rivers adjacent to the city there is sport for the man with the rod to gladden any desciple of Izaak Walton. At not a great distance away, too, the hunter can indulge in the pleasures of the chase at the proper season. Besides all manner of game birds, the gunner will find deer, bear and panther. The first two named animals are by no means few, nor are they small. The sportsman will go many miles before he finds such a "sportsman's paradise, as this island of Vancouver.

Victoria is a very English city and English customs prevail. It must not be inferred from this, though, that there are none but English people and English ways here. The visitor has not been within its boundaries for twenty-four hours before he has seen many peoples, for this sea-port has a most cosmospolitan gathering on her streets. only be it understood, the British are in the ascendency, and when such news comes as reached the city, at the date of this writing, viz. the surrender of Cronje and his army, hese usually ultra quiet Victorians enthuse a la American, and when they enthuse, they do it properly. Flags hang from every available staff and stick, many of the buildings are draped in bunting; the shipping in port is draped; bands are parading the streets playing patriotic airs followed by cheering crowds. There are scenes of wild enthusiasm, for of all the cities of the empire, there are none more loyal than this gateway city of the Pacific Coast, which bears Her Majesty's name.

J. GORDON SMITH.

SYSTEM OF GOVERNMENT.

THE system of government established in British Columbia, in common with that of the other provinces of Canada, is what is properly described as "Responsible Government." By the term "Responsible Government" is meant that the Ministers of the Crown, otherwise called Cabinet Ministers, are held responsible to Parliament and to the law of the land for all public acts of the Crown.

There is a great similarity in the form of government in the Canadian Provinces to that of Great Britain and the Dominion of Canada, the only difference being that there is no Upper House. The representative of the Queen is the Lieutenant-Governor, who is appointed by the Governor-General in Council under the great seal of Canada. Although he is said to hold office only during the pleasure of the Governor-General, yet his tenure of office is usually for a period of five years. By the terms of his commission he is authorized to summon and call the Parliament together, as well as to prorogue the same. He may dismiss his Cabinet Ministers when he finds them representing only a minority of the members of the Legislative Assembly. It is well known, however, that some ministers have received their dismissal, although at the time they had control of the House, or in other words had a good working majority. But this course is rarely adopted by the Queen's Representative unless he has good reasons for such action. When a vacancy for a Lieutenant-Governor occurs, he is usually selected by the authorities at Ottawa from amongst the members of the Upper House who have done good and faithful service on behalf of the party in power. The present Lieutenant-Governor of the Province is the Hon. T. R. McInnes, who formerly had a seat in the Senate.

Prior to Confederation in 1872, the Legislative Assembly of British Columbia consisted of but few members, some of whom were appointed by the Governor, others selected by popular vote. But as population increased, the number of members was likewise increased. At the present time there are thirty-eight representatives, all of whom are elected by ballot. The principal cities return a certain number of members, while the country districts elect the remainder. At elections for members every male of the full age of twenty-one years who is a natural-born or naturalized British subject and who has resided in the Province for welve months and in the electoral district in which he claims to vote for two months immediately previous to sending in his claim to vote, is entitled to vote at any election.

The following members of the Executive Council hold portfolios, viz: Hon. C. A. Semlin, Provincial Secretary, also Premier; Hon. F. Carter-Cotton, Minister of Finance and Chief Commissioner of Lands and Works; Hon. A. Henderson, Attorney-General; and Hon. J. Fred Hume, Minister of Mines. The Hon. R. E. McKechnie is President of the Council without portfolio.

Under each Minister there are one or more deputies, whose duty it is to see that the department work is faithfully performed. The appointment and removal from office of civil servants is vested in the Government. There is no examination for admission into the civil service, nor is there on the other hand any provision made for pensions to old and faithful servants.

THE PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS.

THE Parliament buildings at Victoria, B. C., are situated on an exceptionally charming site. As viewed from the main street of Victoria across the harbor they occupy the summit of a slight elevation. Behind and on either side is a mass of green foliage, contrasting with and enhancing the beauty of the cream-colored stonework, while still further in the distance rise the snow-capped Olympic mountains. In the foreground the green lawn slopes gently down from the terrace in front of the buildings to the edge of the blue waters of the harbor, which is generally studded with little pleasure yachts. As can be imagined the tout ensemble makes a fascinating and unique picture.

The buildings are on broad Renaissance lines, but with Romanesque details worked in, in a harmonious manner. While this adds originality and charm to the structure, it was a necessity imposed by the extreme hardness of the stone, which is a species of very light-colored igneous sandstone, you might call it larva, quarried from Haddington Island, situated about 200 miles north between Vancouver Island and the mainland, the slates with which the roof is covered being also quarried from the large slate deposits near by. These slate deposits are very extensive and are, it is believed, the only ones on the coast. The domes are covered with copper. The interior arrangement of the buildings is very simple. The large entrance hall under the dome, opens direct to three departments on each floor—each department having its own entrances and staircases, however. Behind the dome, which forms a magnificent approach, it having marble mosaic floors and Tennessee marble columns, is the Legislative Hall, a fine chamber, richly decorated, with rare Italian marble panelling and solid green Ceppolino marble columns. A feature of the buildings is their extremely solid construction, the floors all being of concrete, and the staircases of solid cut stonework. Every part of the interior is very light, there not being a dark corridor or room in the structure. The principal rooms are panelled in the best examples of native woods—oak, maple, cedar, cypress, pine and spruce.

The detached building on the left is the Provincial Museum, in which is a rare collection of the Indian curiosities—birds, animals and minerals of the Province—and which is considered to be one of the most interesting museums on the continent. On the right is the printing office, both the last two buildings being connected to the main building by colonnades. The buildings took five years to erect and were built entirely by local contractors, at a total cost, including furniture, of under a million dollars. The architect was F. M. Rattenburg, of Victoria, who obtained the work in open competition.

A woman, Polly McGrail by name, has won a big silk-weavers' strike for her employers in Patterson, New Jersey. When the walk-out was ordered, she refused to go with the others, as she was supporting an invalid husband and a family. For nine months she held her post, teaching green hands the work. She was the target for every sort of abuse, and at one time found it difficult to procure food, as a boycott was declared against everyone who sold her the necessities of life. Several times she had to defend herself with a revolver, and twice she was sandbagged. In spite of all this she held out, and the strike finally collapsed, as she had broken in an entirely new force. The owners of the mill gave her all the credit for their victory.

The best price for a piece of Seattle realty obtained this decade was paid for the building at the corner of Cherry and Second Ave. which changed hands for a consideration of $145,000. Judge H. J. Bond, recently elected president of the California Fruit Growers' Association, was the purchaser. There is a three-story brick building on the property, which is 60x108 feet. Ten years ago, at the height of thereal estate boom, the bare lot sold for $71,000 and the structure cost $70,000. This was very much above its real value, but it is now considered the choicest site in the Queen City, and in it are the offices and plant of the Post-Intelligencer. A big 14-story structure is destined to replace it.

Paderewski, it is evident, is to be as great a sensation in San Francisco as on his former trip. Then he filled the California for every performance and was applauded to the echo. He returns, his great reputation having grown in the interim, for he is recognized to-day as the leading pianist of the world. Some compositions are better rendered by rival artists, but Paderewski unites most of the great styles and plays everything magnificently. During his last tour of the United States it was thought that he had exhausted the possibilities of a popular reclame but this season he has aroused a degree of enthusiasm even greater than he excited before. His magnetism is unabated and his power over the instrument more marvelous than ever.

The individual Paderewski is a man of rare charm and intelligence. He is quite without affectation and he has a mind of great breadth and insight. He is charming to talk with, ready, quick and responsive—indeed he is one of the few celebrities who convinces one of his genius apart from any manifestation thereof.

PRACTICAL EDUCATION.

PROFESSIONAL TRAINING IN SCIENTIFIC PURSUITS AT HEALD'S BUSINESS COLLEGE.

MINING will, for a long time to come, be the most prominent industry in British Columbia. Many who are now engaged in that occupation must have felt the want of technical knowledge. They can, no doubt, recall occasions when they have passed over ground that showed indications of gold, silver, copper or other minerals. At other times they would have given much to be able to take even an approximate assay of a quartz crushing, but they have felt that all this was beyond their ability to attain, by reason of the expense and length of time necessary for its acquisition. Yet two months devoted to a study of the subject at Heald's Business College and School of Practical Sciences, in San Francisco, suffices to equip the learner with a thorough knowledge of assaying and blow-pipe analysis. At the end of that time he will be able to sample a mine correctly, and to make assays, with absolute accuracy, in gold, lead, silver and copper ores. Six months devoted exclusively to mining engineering will give the average student a full practical knowledge of the subject. The general plan is to make the instruction concise and thorough, and by divesting it of all unnecessary technicalities, reduce the time to such a compass that anyone can, in a few months, learn all that is needed for ordinary purposes. The full course includes Assaying, Blow-Pipe Analysis, Mill Construction, Mining (sinking shafts, running tunnels, inclines, cross cuts, etc.), Milling, Geology, Mineralogy, Metallurgy and Surveying. During the past three years a great many mining men and prospectors from all parts of the West have entered the department, and in every instance they have expressed themselves as being well pleased with the results. Like everything taught in the College, it is a practical course for practical men.

The department is fitted with all necessary laboratories, workshops, furnaces, apparatus, etc., and is in charge of competent instructors. No one need be deterred from entering on account of the cost. The terms for instruction in assaying and blow-pipe analysis (combined) are $35, and the very complete mining engineering course can be taken in six months for $100.

There is also a course in Civil Engineering which comprises Algebra, Geometry, Trigonometry, Surveying, Draughting, etc.

The instruction in Surveying includes class lectures, map-making, and actual field work. The learner is taught how to run straight lines properly, how to lay out townships and sections, and to subdivide city property into lots. Considerable practice is given in traverse-surveying and computing areas of irregular tracts of land by means of latitudes and departures. Instruction is given in surveying meridians and base lines; also how to find the longitude and latitude by the north star, and by the use of solar attachments and the solar compass.

Special attention is paid to topography. Considerable practice is given in laying out flumes and ditches for irrigating, also in running levels for the purpose of building wire tramways, etc. The civil engineering student has special practice in railroad surveying, and the mining engineering student in the line of work that will be required of him in the mines and mining engineering. Railr ad surveying is taught the mining engineer, if desired.

Another noticeable feature of the college is the department of Electrical Engineering. The wonderful growth of electrical science during the past few years and the illimitable field it offers for further explorations and inventions obviously makes it the great profession of the future.

Heald's Business College was the first school of its class in the United States to recognize the vast importance of the subject and it carefully arranged a course that would be within the limit and means of the average young man who has to make his own way in the world. This experiment met with immediate success. The student and work now cover all the modern applications of electricity. Each student has to manufacture in the workshop a large proportion of the apparatus and the oral teachings are thus supplemented by actual practice and demonstration. This assures a thorough training, mechanical as well as theoretical. The work is so mapped out as to give the learner at the end of six months a practical knowledge that will enable him to be self-supporting. The cost of the course for that time is $100.

There is at present and will be for many years a constant demand for young men with a strong theoretical knowledge of electrical science. Hardly a month passes that electricity is not applied to some new purpose and it consequently affords a better opportunity for ambitious young men than any other. A large proportion of the men at the head of electrical interests have not taken a regular training in electrical engineering and are consequently at a great disadvantage on this account.

The commercial departments of Heald's Business College represent the experience and development of more than thirty-three years. In common with everything taught in the school, the instruction is based on the principle of learning by practice and the success that has attended this method is shown by the fact that some 17,000 of its graduates are now in active business or professional life. Indeed, there is hardly a business house or corporation of any magnitude in California, Oregon, Nevada, Arizona, Washington, Idaho or Montana, that has not one or more of them in its employment.

Some idea of the extent to which the details are simulated in this great school may be gathered from the statement that upwards of 800 different business forms are used by pupils in the bookkeeping course. Each one has been taken from the best available original and the number includes every possible document or paper used in commercial transactions.

Students are also taught the use of all labor-saving devices. Three College banks are required to conduct the business of the department and these necessitate a Clearing House. About 900 pupils a year annually pass through the commercial class rooms, not entirely with a view of becoming bookkeepers or clerks, but for the purpose of acquiring an education that will enable them to manage their own affairs in a business-like manner, or with the intention of making the course the foundation for a professional career.

The Shorthand Department has usually from 100 to 400 students under instruction. Five teachers are employed therein; fifty writing machines are needed for service. During the past ten years this department alone has sent to employment upwards of 1,000 of its graduates, and they are to be found occupying every variety of stenographic positions, not only throughout the West, but in almost every city of importance in the civilized world.

A Department of Telegraphy, carefully modeled after the best modern systems, affords those who desire an opportunity to become practical telegraphers.

There are subsidiary departments of Languages and English.

The College keeps a record of the graduates it places in employment and the figures for the last eight years are as follows:

1894—134	1898—189

The total is 1,470.

A large proportion of the business men of the West received their first practical education within its walls. The late Senator Stanford, the founder of the Stanford University, was so impressed with the advantages it offered that he enrolled his son for a course. Its reputation in the East is shown by the fact that it is one of the six Business Colleges selected out of the very large number throughout the entire country, to represent the development of commercial education at the Paris Exposition, being so chosen, says the official notification, "on account of its high standing and superiority." Its faculty of twenty-five teachers has been selected with the greatest care. The curriculum embraces everything necessary for the most complete commercial or scientific education, and the method of individual instruction permits each student to progress in accordance with his aptitude and industry. All studies are elective, and pupils can devote as much or as little time to any subject as may be desired.

Heald's Business College Journal, the monthly publication of the school is the oldest commercial school paper in the United States, and probably in the world. Copies of it, and of the 84-page cloth-bound catalogue will be forwarded to any address on application.

DRAKE AMALGAMATOR.

IT IS UNQUESTIONABLY THE GREATEST GOLD SAVING MACHINE ON THE MARKET.

It happens very often that the discovery of some new industrial field brings into prominence some little-known invention or mechanical device which has been working along quietly and obscurely for years, before the new conditions gave it a new field of usefulness. For instance, when electricity came into common use for commercial purposes, this was the history of many electrical devices which had scarcely been heard of before the day of electric tramways and motors. And this has been the history of a remarkable new device for handling gold bearing-sands, which was brought into prominence by the new conditions arising when Cape Nome was discovered.

Since the discovery of the Cape Nome gold fields much valuable metal in the rich beach sands has been wasted. The miners went at their work in haphazard fashion, with pan and shovel and rocker, ignorant of the fact that the Nome sands, being of peculiar quality, would not yield all their riches to these primitive methods. As a result, half the work already done at Nome will have to be done over again, and many beach claims, already worked over and abandoned, will give a second harvest when new methods are employed.

These methods are a puzzle to the expert miner. The beach sands of Cape Nome and the north in general present practical problems never before encountered by miners. The gold itself is very fine; much of it is what is called by miners "flour" gold. The black and ruby sands in which it is found are very heavy, being of almost equal weight with the gold. From this it happened that both amalgamation and gravity, used separately, were inadequate to the purpose. With amalgamation, where the gold was caught by the quicksilver in the pan and then separated by evaporation, only about 60 per cent of the metal was saved. But little better results ensued when plates of copper with silver coating were employed in ordinary rockers. There is no doubt that silver plate has great affinity for gold, but the passage of the coarse sand and gravel over such plates as were used at Nome scoured the surface so as to render them valueless in a short time. Moreover, most of the rocker devices in use there have expected too much for the size of the plates in use. In a five stamp mill, 64 to 128 square feet of surface is expected to handle only eight or ten tons of pulp in twenty-four hours. In many of these machines, 24 square feet of plate is expected to amalgamate 100 to 250 tons of this coarse sand per day, and that without scouring. The use of such machines has probably lost as much flour gold as has the use of the antiquated pan. Each of these methods has lost 40 per cent of the gold worked in the first season. In other words, a claim worked out last summer to the tune of, say, $10,000, has still $4,000 worth of gold left in the sand already passed through the pan or the rocker. The gold is there; if the present beach-miners give it up and pass on to other fields, those who follow will take a profit only second to the original yield, providing the newcomers have the right appliances.

What sort of an appliance is necessary to extract this remnant from the sand already washed and to prevent waste in new fields? It must be one in which both gravity and amalgamation are made use of. Also, since amalgamation, when properly used, is the best single means of saving fine gold, and since the sands are of about the same specific gravity as the gold and the whole mass can therefore be moved the more easily from place to place, it follows that a machine which, combining proper concentration and amalgamation, would bring black sand, ruby sand and gold together to the same place at the same time, is the ideal one for the Northern beach sands.

Such a machine has been in practical operation for years, working the low grade sands of the Colorado and Snake rivers. If it has never before been on the market, if it was not known to the practical Cape Nome miners at the time when they began operations, it was because the conditions in the Cape Nome sands, like those in the low-grade sands of the Colorado river, were peculiar to themselves. Yet it has for years handled with profit dirt running only 25 cents to the cubic yard, and handled the concentrates of 250 tons a day.

Mr. F. J. Drake, an experienced miner and prospector, is the inventor of the machine, and has fully tested its merits, so that, in placing it on the market, he is certain that it will do all that is expected of it, viz.: save all but the infinitesimal percentage of gold from the heaviest beach sands. Briefly stated, the mechanism of the amalgamator attachment to the new machine consists of six sections of riffles, there being eight riffles to the section. These riffles may be charged with quicksilver should the occasion require it, but in most cases, and with a proper method of segregation, the great part of the values may be extracted without the use of quicksilver. The sections are placed together in a frame so that they can be conveniently removed, and at an angle which prevents any current over the riffles. The debris is carried off with the water in agitation. The gold settles into the bottom of the riffles, and, where quicksilver is used, every particle of gold or sand comes in contact with the amalgamating metal. The peculiar shape of these riffles prevents also any loss of quicksilver—a consideration of some account as Cape Nome values in quicksilver go. So, also, the material cannot at any time cover the surface for a depth of over one-sixteenth of an inch. The capacity depends upon both the quality of material and of gold, but it can safely be depended upon to handle pulp or concentrates to the amount of from 100 to 250 tons in twenty-four hours with less than three miner's inches of water. And while the machine is of particular value in handling flour gold of the Cape Nome fineness, it will treat the coarser flake metal with equal efficiency.

To summarize, the chief merits claimed for this new invention are about as follows: It will save anything that will settle or amalgamate; it prevents the waste of quicksilver or the loss of amalgam, which last is a fault of copper plates: it requires only about one-third the water needed for the same number of feet of plate surface, it works all grades of sand equally well, so that it is not necessary to know in advance the values contained in the material being worked; it has the greatest capacity of any gold-saving device; and—greatest merit of all to the practical miner—it has been tested and improved by years of experience, so that it is no longer an experiment. Combined with these greater merits are others scarcely less in value. It requires less power to operate and takes up less space than any other gold-saving device. It needs no sluice head of water to prevent the sand from banking. It does away with these collections of verdegris which prevent perfect amalgamation. All these merits have been tested and proved by years of practical work in the Southwest; they will be proved again this coming summer on hundreds of beach claims at Cape Nome. On exhibition daily at Krogh Manufacturing Company, 9-17 Stevenson street.

HOTEL VICTORIA
THE LEADING CARAVANSARY OF BRITISH COLUMBIA.

In this issue of the Wave we have tried editorially and in the illustrations to call the attention of the tourist to some of the attractions with which nature has endowed Victoria, and we would be lax in our duty to our readers did we not give them some information in regard to hotel accommodations.

In choosing a hotel the tourist who follows the commercial traveler cannot be far wrong. In Victoria we find most of the knights of the grip with Mr. Leason at The Victoria, a strictly first-class caravansary in every respect and a favorite stopping place for the army officers in British Columbia.

From the bell boys to the head clerk, Mr. Hector McKenzie, Mr. Leason has drawn about him an able corps of able assistants, all of whom study the comfort of guests, and who are thoroughly acquainted with the details and requisites essential in the conducting of a first-class institution.

The Victoria is centrally located; it contains all the modern improvements; it has a large transient patronage, yet it has a quiet, homelike air and a tone of old-fashioned gentility. Because the larget majority of people appreciate such a living place and seek for it, The Victoria is one of the most prosperous hotels in British Columbia, having a long list of permanent guests and the best of the "floating population." It is really a sort of headquarters for the military in British Columbia, as like Occidental in San Francisco. Those who know what solid comfort is invariably come to The Victoria and one finds on its register the signatures of the best people in the Province.

Hector McKenzie.

Mr. Leason sees to it that each and every guest receives all the little attentions that go to make life pleasant. One's individual comfort is looked after with a care rarely found outside of one's own home. The cuisine is of notable excellence. The whole house is pleasant and comfortable. A free bus meets all boats.

CONSUL SMITH.
The United States Govt's Representative in Victoria.

THE Consul of the United States at Victoria is Mr. Abraham E. Smith, of Rockford, Illinois, who has occupied that responsible position since August, 1897. Mr. Smith was for twenty-five years an active member of the editorial fraternity, and his habits of observation there formed have proved invaluable in his present position. He is recognized as one of the most vigilant and faithful Consuls in the Dominion; his reports on the economic and mining conditions of the coast have been republished in most of the leading papers of the United States. While it is conceded that in no part of our National administration has there been more improvement than in the Consular service, it may be stated that our Consul at Victoria holds front rank among his colleagues. Mr. Smith also keeps closely in touch with the leaders of Victoria and British Columbia, and is popular with all classes. He is demanded at many social gatherings and banquets, where his remarks are always greeted with applause. Last summer the State Department appointed Consul Smith special commissioner to settle the fishery boat seizures at Point Roberts, and he has also been intrusted with other delicate missions. A visit to the Consulate at Victoria at once transports one to the United States. The stars and stripes wave over the office; the walls are covered with portraits of Washington, Lincoln, McKinley, Grant, Blaine, and other distinguished Americans, including Senator Cullom and Representative Hitt, from the praire state of Illinois. Mr. Abraham Smith's official record is as follows: Appointed postmaster at Woodstock, Ill., by President Lincoln; postmaster at Rockford, Ill., by President U. S. Grant; Commissioner to the Paris Exposition, by Gov. Fifer; trustee of the Illinois University; Consul to Victoria, B. C.

American Steel and Wire Co.'s State Fair Exhibit.

Wire probably plays a more important part in modern life than any other one product of our industries. The extent to which it is used may be realized perhaps from the statistics of the iron and steel wire manufactures of the United States. Every year this country produces about 1,000,000 tons of iron or steel wire. Reduced to pounds this gives 2,000,000,000 as the annual output of the wire mills, or about thirty pounds of wire for every man, woman and child in the United States. If all of this were drawn down to a diameter of 26-1000 of an inch, one of the larger sizes used for banjo and mandolin strings, it would make a string more than two hundred million miles long, or enough to wrap around the earth 40,333 times, or to form a two-wire metallic telephone line to the sun. The metal which goes to make up this enormous mass of wire is about 10 per cent of the entire output of our iron mines, and the finished product is equal in amount to the average production of railroad rails, and is probably more than enough to form the frames of all the great steel sky scrapers erected in the whole country during the year.

It would be as easy to enumerate the things in which wire is not used as it would be to give a list of those of which it forms a part. Your spectacle bows are made of wire, the rivets of your pocket knife are wire, your shoe heels are held together with a wire product and you wipe your feet on a wire mat. Your wife is apt to have wire or wire products spread about her costume from head to foot. Her hat frame is often of wire, its flowers are built on wire stems; she fastens it to her head with pins of wire; her girdle and its dependent ornaments are often wire products, while her parasol or umbrella is largely made of wire. We sleep on wire mattresses, we travel on cars drawn by wire cables, and we depend upon wire for all the communications we have with one another over the telegraph or telephone. When we fly great kites for scientific purposes we often use wire for a string, and we could not explore the depths of the sea without wire sounding lines. We fence our fields with wire and nail our houses with wire nails. This last use for wire is comparatively new, but it is probably now the largest one that exists. The wire nail was invented abroad. Twenty years or so ago the only places where it was seen in this country were in foreign packing boxes, in accordions and cigar boxes. These nails were all made of iron, with thin, flat heads, which were usually very ragged about the edges. The nails or heads in general use then were of square sections cut from strips of iron. Today the cut nail has almost disappeared from general use and has been replaced by the wire nail. To drive a nail, when the tapered cut nail was the only one to be had, was an art which it was said a woman could never acquire, but any one can drive a wire nail. The way in which the wire nail has displaced the cut nail is shown in these figures: In 1866, out of a total production of 8,760,000 kegs, only 600,000 kegs, or 6.9 per cent were made of wire. In 1896 the total production was 6,335,730 kegs, and of these 4,719,800 kegs were wire nails, or 74.5 per cent. Each keg weighs 100 pounds, so that of the 2,000,000,000 pounds of wire made, this industry alone consumed 633,573,000 pounds, or about one-third. Another third is used for making barbed or plain fence wire, the remaining third going into the innumerable manufactures of the country, from the material which forms the hook that enables the fisherman to take his prey, to the bicycle spoke or the vibrating cords of the piano or mandolin. Without wire we could not card our wool or cotton to prepare it for shipping, nor make a loom to weave it into cloth. Today even the largest cannons are built of wire, and England has already got a number of big guns in service made of this material, which have proved themselves far superior in many ways to those built of more solid sections. No dynamos, motors or other electrical instruments of any kind could be made with wire. The strongest of all the wires made is that for pianos and other musical intruments. This is of fine steel and tempered, and it is calculated to be able to resist a strain of 424,000 pounds the square inch of section.

The wire cloth makers, who make all kinds of fabric from mosquito netting to fence cloth with meshes six or eight inches square, use enormous quantities of wire, and another great quantity is used in making the spiral springs which are used in all kinds of upholstered furniture.

The general manner of making wire is first to roll the rods down to a convenient size for handling, and then, after tapering an end, to pass the rod through tapered holes in a plate, which grow successively smaller and smaller. The wire is drawn through these holes by means of tongs, which grip the tapered ends, and then it is wound on reels. The drawing hardens the material, and it has to be annealed at frequent intervals by heating. In drawing very fine wires of gold or silver or other precious metals the draw holes are often drilled through diamonds or rubies, and the making of these plates is a special industry.

There are more than 1000 sizes of wire made, ranging in measurement ftom the minimum of 1-1000 of an inch in diameter.

This great output of a million tons of wire in the United States is practically all manufactured by the various mills of the American Steel & Wire Company. This company comprises some forty-two mills, located in the most advantageous manufacturing districts of the United States. The American Steel & Wire Company's product is vastly greater than that of an other company in the world. They lead all other wire manufacturing concerns in the world as regards the volume of their output and the variety and extent of their manufactures, which comprise wire of every description, and everything made from wire—barbed wire, plain wires of every description, field fencing, poultry netting, wire ropes and cables for logging and mining, street railways, tramways, ropeways, etc., copper and insulated wires for electric light and power companies, electric street railways, telephone and telegraph companies.

In addition to the wire products proper produced by this company, they also manufacture a great many specialties, such as the Shoenberger horse-shoes, Shoenberger boiler plates and sheet steel, Cleveland cold-rolled shafting, chain of every description, double-pointed tacks; in facr, their line is so extensive that it is one of the greatest manufacturing institutions in the world. Their trade compasses every part of the United States, as well as North and South America, and they are making extensive shipments to all foreign countries China, Japan, Australia, Java, Turkey, England and the Continent, as well as to St. Petersburg and Vladivostock, in far-away Russia.

The American Steel & Wire Company maintain an important manufacturing industry on the Pacific Coast, their factory here being known as the Pacific Works, covering over two and one-half acres of ground located between Bay, Powell, Mason and North Point streets in San Francisco. Their general sales offices are at Nos. 8 and 10 Pine street, San Francisco, and their branch sales agencies are located at No. 201 North Los Angeles street, Los Angeles, Cal.; 231 to 235 Pine street, Portland, Oregon; 108 West Washington street, Dexter Horton Bank building, Seattle, Washington; and at Spokane Falls, Washington; Butte, Montana; and Salt Lake City, Utah. This company is one of the most enterprising and progressive business insitutions on the Pacific Coast, and are doing a great deal to assist in the development of the local manufacturing interests, as their products are largely manufactured and supplied from the Pacific works, in San Francisco. The enterprise and facilities of this great company were well illustrated by the magnificent display of their varied products which is shown on this page. This display was the most complete and extensive of manufactured products ever made at the State Fair in Sacramento, and was the center of attraction to the many thousand visitors to last year's State Fair. The display was thought so highly of that it received the grand gold medal for the most complete and artistic display, and in addition was also awarded five other gold medals and awards of merit for individual lines.

The policy of this company is broad-gauge and progressive, their treatment of their patrons fair and reasonable, and they will be glad to have anyone interested in the subject of wire or wire products call upon them at any of their sales agencies, where they will be furnished full information regarding wire products, and accorded all courtesies possible in supplying their requirements.

In addition to their display at the State Fair in Sacramento, this company also made extensive displays of their products at the Mechanics' Fair in San Francisco, where they also received the first award of merit; at the Humboldt County Fair in Eureka, California; at the State Fair in Salem, Oregon; at the Portland, Oregon, Exposition, and the Spokane Falls Exposition, at all of which places their exhibits were the center of attraction, and received much commendation from visitors for their completeness and excellence, as well as the many interesting features in the displays.

AT THE THEATERS

"Work in a stock company is the hardest in the business and about the hardest work known to man," said Ernest Hastings of the Alcazar Company. "If audiences only knew what it means to prepare one play and present another simultaneously, week after week, they would be more ready to pardon little slips in acting or in business. Literally, the actors in a stock company, and especially the leading people, have no time which they can call their own. It is a constant strain on mind and nerves, and is even harder on the body than one would suppose.

"In my own case, for example, the working day begins with rehearsal at ten o'clock. I needn't tell you that to do that I must be up by half-past eight. Rehearsal is sometimes, though rarely, over by one; very often it lasts through the afternoon. But if it closes early, I must study lines the rest of the afternoon. To make up and get ready, I must be at the theatre by seven, and if I am lucky, I get out of my make up by half-past eleven. Sometimes I have supper and go to bed after that, but often, when next week's part is hard, I am up studying until three or four in the morning. Two matinees extra are crowded in on top of all this. Literally, one has no time to himself, none at all.

"It is easier, of course, for people in minor parts, because they have not so much study, but they have all the rehearsals and performances to attend, just the same. A good memory is a great convenience, but excellence of memory doesn't always go with ability to play leading roles. Some of the very best actors in the country are terribly slow on lines, while some actors who aren't worth five dollars a week can learn roles almost as they can read them.

"Of course, when a play runs two weeks or so, like 'Never Again,' things let down a bit, but not so much as you would suppose. The extra time is put in to give an extra polish to the next play. Sometimes you feel like throwing it over and going on a road company, where you play one or two parts the season through and have no heavy rehearsing after the tour begins, but after all it's in hard work like this that an actor learns."

The Orpheum bill rises above the average again. Walter Jones and Norma Whalley are billed by the management as the star attraction. Jones is very clever; he will be remembered for the hit he scored as the tramp in "1492." His imitation of Sousa is worth special notice. Nearly every impersonator takes a whack at the composer-conductor, but Jones manages to catch the exact move and mannerism of the original without overdoing. His team-mate is one of the prettiest women, in face and figure, ever seen on the Orpheum stage, but nature dowered her with these gifts at the expense of voice. The Neilsen Sisters are gifted and deficient in exactly the opposite direction, having the fresh, unspoiled voices which are as pearls before swine in vaudeville. The act of W. C. Fields, "novelty juggler," consists more of novelty than of juggling. Mr. and Mrs. Sydney Drew and their comedietta, "When Two Hearts Are Won," continue the most popular feature. The piece is undoubtedly clever, but it has "Sapho" tendencies which unfit it for the Sunday-school circuit.

Ada Rehan has begun her spring tour under the direction of Klaw & Erlanger at Ford's Opera House in Baltimore. She is to present "The Taming of the Shrew," "As You Like It," "School for Scandal," and the double bill, "Subtleties of Jealousy," and "The Country Girl." This selection from her repertoire will afford her the best opportunity to appear in parts which she regards as among her best—Katherine, Rosalind, Lady Teazle, and Peggy. These plays will be mounted with the scenery and effects used in their original presentation at Daly's Theatre. Miss Rehan's support is made up of artists who played with her under the management of the late Augustin Daly. George Clarke is the stage director of her company. The Klaw-Erlanger combination is one of the most effective branches of the syndicate and certainly understand the art of staging. They are the producers of "Ben Hur," which is playing to average receipts of $2,080 a night, and has had its 135th performance. There seems to be no abatement of the play's popularity, and it will doubtless run for months to come. The production cost a fortune, but the entrepreneurs have long recouped their outlay and are drawing immense dividends as the reward of their enterprise.

"Mr. Smooth," Willie Collier's new play in which the author stars, opens next week at the Columbia. The wit of Collier's "gagging" in "The Man From Mexico," gave rise to the suspicion that he could write. He tried his hand in "Mr. Smooth"; it achieved instant success in New York and Chicago, and is said to be a thoroughly original production. Louise Allen Collier and other clever people are in the cast.

Alfred A. Farland, called the "greatest living exponent of the banjo," will give a concert at Sherman and Clay Hall on Friday, March 23. He will be assisted by Adelaide Roddy, soprano, and C. F. Graeber's Mandolin Orchestra. R. Fletcher Tilton will act as accompanist.

Charles Sweet, the tramp pianist, who heads the new Orpheum bill, is a real student of the instrument, and a comedian besides. A. L. Guille, a tenor long associated with Patti; Keno, Welch and Melrose, acrobats; and Loney Haskell, author-comedian, are the other new people.

At the California, "Pudd'nhead Wilson" has been playing to good attendance this week. "On the Suwanee River" follows, and Paderewski is to be heard there in the near future.

"Aunt Jack" is the Alcazar's bill next week. It is a howling farce built around a case at law.

GASOLINE ENGINES.

The most durable, most economical, and in every way the most satisfactory gasoline, oil and gas engines now in use on the Coast are those made and handled by the Union Gas Engine Company of San Francisco. This supremacy is the result of fifteen years of careful work and enlightened methods. No class of motor needs more care in construction than gas and gasoline engines; it is a case where the best work is undoubtedly the cheapest. And the Union engines are the best.

The points in their favor are such as will appeal to every practical engineer. They are substantial and compact, with extra large wearing surfaces, perfectly fitted, and made with an allowance greatly in excess of all possible strains. The shafts and connecting rods are of the best open hearth forged steel. The connecting rod brasses are of Phosphor bronze. The metal used in the crank bearings is the same that has proved so satisfactory in the bearings of the warships Olympia, Oregon and Charleston. The cylinders, pistons, valves and cams are of specially close grained iron, made to stand hard usage. A feature in which the makers take special pride is the ease with which the modern engines of this make can be taken apart, examined and replaced. As far as possible, all parts are on the outside and easily accessible, and there are no unnecessary parts.

Above all else, the Union Company is most solicitous about careful workmanship. The utmost care is taken in adjusting and fitting, so that all fixed parts shall be rigid and in perfect alignment, and all movable parts shall have the least possible friction. After the parts are made and fitted, each engine is given a practical test to determine its capacity at the speed required and its ability to hold that speed. No engine leaves the Union Gas Engine foundry until it has passed this test.

The uses to which Union engines are put on this Coast are infinite. Especially, since the discovery of petroleum in California, has a new field of usefulness opened for them.

MODIFIED OMNISCIENCE.—It was at the First Presbyterian Church Sunday school, and the teacher was endeavoring to impress her class with the idea of the Lord's omniscience. "Why, just think," she said, "He knows the name of every one of you." Hazel Kirschenschlager leaned forward in her chair, with an expression of incredulity on her face. "Well," she said, after a moment, "perhaps he does know my name, but I'll bet he doesn't know how to spell it."

EQUAL TO THE EXCUSE.—In the Recollections of Sir Algeron West there is the story of the canon of Winchester, who wrote to the town clerk asking that the amount of his carriage-duty might be remitted, the carriage being used only to take his infirm parishioners to church on Sunday. "Tell the canon," was the clerk's reply, "that the board will not insist on the old people going to church."

SLIM JIM BATES'S MISTAKE.

"Several years ago a very benevolent-looking man put up at one of the principal hotels in New York. He came from a city in Massachusetts, and was in the city to attend a meeting of Presbyterians who were interested in some charitable movement involving the expenditure of a large sum of money. He was about sixty years of age, with a long, flowing beard and the general appearance of a mark—that is, from the confidence man's point of view. Mr. Smith, which is as good a name as any, was duly spotted at his hotel by Slim Jim Bates. Mr. Bates was a cadaverous-looking young man, with a hungry look about him and a general appearance of sanctity. Added to this was remarkable power of conversation, and a convincing way that would fool many a man who thinks he is a wise one. Slim Jim was a very successful bunco man, a fact which he attributed to his absolute confidence in himself. Success had been so invariable with him that once he got on with a man nothing would convince him that the man was not as good as plucked. It was this peculiarity that proved his undoing.

"By a coincidence, of course Mr. Bates, and Mr. Smith breakfasted together one morning at the hotel where the latter was stopping. Mr. Bates in that way common to members of his profession but beyond the knowledge of the layman had contrived to learn enough about his chance table companion to give him a ground work to start on. Mr. Smith hadn't half eaten his omelet before he was discussing foreign missions with the solemn looking young man opposite him. The two went far into the subject, Slim Jim differing with the man from New England just enough to keep the discussion going and to add a spice to it.

"'Last year,' said the slim one, 'it was a matter of much indecision with me whether to give my regular contribution to the foreign missions or to put it in the hands of those men who are devoting their lives to similar work at home. I took the trouble to look into the matter a bit, and I found that the needs at home were far greater than those abroad. So I added my mite to the home mission.'

"Now this little speech made a hit with the man from Massachusetts. He thought he would like to see more of his new friend. In time, he said, he felt sure that he could show Mr. Bates, for Jim had given his own name, that he was wrong in believing that home missions were of more importance than foreign ones. Mr. Bates expressed himself as more than pleased with the prospect of a further discussion, and that ended the first meeting.

"Of course it looked like easy meat. Slim Jim hugged himself with glee as he sneaked into a barroom around the corner and got a couple of drinks to take the bad taste out of his mouth. He spent the next afternoon playing checkers with his new friend, and for a week after there were regular afternoon checker meetings in the parlor of the hotel. Finally one night Jim swung the old man around to a discussion of vice in New York. Mr. Smith showed great interest in the matter and thought that a trip around some of the gambling houses for the purpose of gathering material for a lecture on the subject would not be a bad idea. Jim wanted to go at once, for only a few blocks away a pal had been waiting day and night for over ten days for the man from Massachusetts to be steered up against him. Mr. Smith couldn't spare the time from a meeting of the Foreign Mission Society, to be held that night, however, but suggested that Jim accompany him and put off the tour of the town until some other time. Jim yielded with a bad grace and in a little while was one of a room full of frock-coated men, whose thoughts were of the redemption of the sinner abroad. Jim had to shake hands with about twenty of them, and his sponsor having given away his views on foreign missions, he had to stand a whole lot of guff from some, who seemed to regard it as their particular function to swing him around to their way of thinking. In an evil moment he so far forgot himself as to pretend to be converted to the views of his new friends. He forgot that only that afternoon he had told Mr. Smith that he had not yet made his annual contribution to the home missionary fund, but expected to at any moment as he had just drawn a large sum of money from the bank.

"Jim never did things half way and, having become a foreign mission man, he got into the game with both feet. His voice was one of the loudest when it came to enthusing about the work in hand, but he became a sphinx when the meeting was called to order by the chairman, who was no other than his friend, Mr. Smith.

"'My friends,' said Mr. Smith, 'you all know the object of our meeting to-day. A large sum must be raised at once for the continuance of the work undertaken in China, Japan and Corea. A great deal of money has already been pledged to our cause, and I am happy to say that I have brought with me to-night a man who, while he has previously held views different from our own in regard to missionary work, is now entirely in accord with us. I am very sure that we can expect our newest ally to do what he can for the cause that is so near and dear to us all.'

"Say, there's no use of my going into a whole lot more details about the stringing Slim Jim got that night. They threw it into that poor con man in scandalous style. With Jim it was put up something or quit all of his plans, and being a game one he handed over his little $50 when the collector got around to him.

"This broke Jim, and as it was about up to him to make some kind of a report to his silent partner, who was getting a little tired, he went around to see him. He gave such a glowing report of the victim that his pal immediately forked over a century, to be used in carrying the game on for a little more time. He found Mr Smith waiting at the hotel for the regular afternoon checker game. They hadn't been playing more than fifteen minutes when in walked a man who informed the benevolent looking man that he must have $25 at once in order to get a missionary off to the South. Smith didn't have the money right at hand, and borrowed the amount from Jim. That night Smith took Jim around to a rescue for fallen men, where Smith gave up a ten spot, and Jim, not to be blanketed, followed suit. The next morning there was another session of the mission crowd, and they got in on Jim again, so that night he had to go around and touch his pal for more coin. The latter made a horrible kick, and swore that if the chicken wasn't plucked at once he was going to quit the game once and for all, and hold Jim responsible for the amount sunk in the venture. Jim agreed to push the matter at once and the turning joint was put in order, and everything prepared for the proper separation of Mr. Smith and his money.

"The good man was found at the hotel, and to him Jim repeated his proposition that they go around the town and see some of the dark side of life.

"'If you've got any money with you,' he said, 'I know a man who will show us things that neither of us has ever seen or even suspected.'

"'Oh, I've got money all right,' said Mr. Smith, 'but who is this worldly wise friend of yours that can show us these marvels?'

"'Well, said Jim, a feeling of impending success coming over him, "I'm not exactly proud of my friend, because he happens to be the turner of a roulette wheel around the corner. But he's the best in the world for our purpose, for we can see the first of the marvels of New York right in the place where he works.'

"'Well it's all very interesting,' said Mr. Smith, 'and I'm tempted to accompany you on

Tired Out

And she does not understand why. Her work used to seem so easy. You could tell her whereabouts as she worked by the snatches of song which now and again overflowed her happy lips. And now she can hardly keep up. Her head pains, her back hurts, and she feels entirely worn out. What is the matter? The probability is that the stomach is disordered, the liver is not performing its whole duty. Poisons are accumulating in the blood, and unless these are removed, and the stomach and organs of digestion and nutrition cured and strengthened, there is liable to be a serious illness. There is no medicine can equal Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery for prompt help and perfect cure for diseases of the stomach and blood. It strengthens the stomach, purifies the blood, nourishes the nerves, and brings back the happy days of health, when life is all song and sunshine.

"I suffered ten months from a complicated case of liver complaint, constipation, indigestion, suppression of monthly function, and kidney disease, too," writes Miss Lula M. Brittle, of Ivor, Va. "I also suffered excruciating pain in my back and head. I am glad to say that six bottles of 'Golden Medical Discovery,' three vials of Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Pellets, and two bottles of 'Compound Extract of Swart-Weed' cured me entirely. I gladly recommend Dr. Pierce's medicines to all sufferers."

your little trip. I want to go up to my room first, however, and write a note to an idiot that has been pestering me for a long time. After I've disposed of him, and you're still of a mind to make this little excursion, why I'll go with you.'

"Well, Jim said there was absolutely no hurry about starting, and after Smith had gone upstairs he sauntered over to the cigar counter and blew himself to a quarter cigar. I guess he had smoked about half of it, while laying off in a big armchair, when a bellboy tapped him on the shoulder.

"'Excuse me sir,' he said, 'but are you Mr. Bates?'

"'That's my name,' said Jim. 'What do you want?'

"'A note, sir,' said the boy. 'The gentleman said there might be an answer, and that I was to call back here in five minutes to see!'

"Without the slightest suspicion of anything but a formal communication from some friend, Jim opened the letter. It read:

"'Dear Mr. Bates: You are a very bright young man, but your methods are a little crude. I have met many scoundrels in my day, but never before one who was so easy to work as you. It would be foolish for me to tickle your vanity even to the extent of pretending that I was deceived in you for a moment; also it would be a lie. I am tempted to come down and give you a few lessons in the profession you have chosen, but if I yielded to all of the temptations that have come to me in the last few days, I am afraid that you would be in the hospital now instead of waiting to take me on a trip around the town. Take a piece of advice from a man who is old enough to be your father, and don't think that every man who wears white whiskers and goes to church is a fool. There is nothing more for me to say excepting that the money you contributed to the cause of foreign missions will be properly applied. Thanks for it; also for the money you gave to assist in the elevation of fallen men. In fifteen minutes I will be downstairs to take that walk around town with you. Will you be ready? My messenger will call for an answer. Yours truly,

"'JOHN SMITH.'

"Well, Slim Jim Bates took the largest tumble to himself after he read that letter that he had ever taken in his life. He folded it carefully, put it in his pocket and walked out of the house. N. Y. Sun.

A DEMOCRATIC STATE BALL AT THE ELYSEE.

TO-DAY I have seen democracy at its worst, and am disgusted. This evening, as I sit and watch the night-birds of Paris flitting under the lamps, I would that an Orleans or a Bonaparte were on the gilt throne of the Elysee, and Loubet and Waldeck-Rousseau and libertee-galite-fraternite were shut up in some new Bastile or on the way to La Guillotine.

This is a melancholy reflection, the product of a mind over-burdened with sights unpleasant, and the whole world palls. I am in the state when one sees not the grass, nor the leaves, nor the children playing along the curbs, but only the dirt in the streets. So forgive me, ye sons of democracy at home, and listen to my plea: I have been to the official reception at the Elysee, and am surfeited with the company manners of the masses. A democracy has no business to attempt such things—least of all the French democracy, where the very persons to whom the parade of public and official functions is native keep away on principle. A government "for the people, etc." shows in its strength and dignity at the polls or on the battlefield, or on the bench of justice, but its fetes are ever a sorry affair. Your democracy is a yokel—a Boer—joy to him when he is behind a rock with a Mauser covering his enemy, but woe to his dignity when he puts on a court dress and a sword.

I will say this for it—'twas better than it used to be in the time of Faure, that gentleman of peasant habits In his day, it was like a business transaction from the start. The functionary to whom you gave your hat and coat used to roll it up into a bundle and tie it with a wrapping-cord and hurl it, with the air of a baggage-smasher, on top of a pile. To-night they hung them up at least. Then, the guests were attended by waiters hired from cheap restaurants at a few francs a head—and they showed restaurant manners. To-night, that was done by servants in livery. Certainly, an improvement in service. But the crowd—it was even worse than before.

Imagine such a crowd as attends the White House receptions; not the official affairs, but those to which the public is admitted freely. Take from this crowd the society element, those who know how to act on dress-parade—for such persons, in France, are attached to the cause of the old regime and never attend the president's "blowout"; add to it a disproportionate number of the shopkeeper class, small in stature, features, mind, and loud in display; permeate the whole with a spirit of cynical vulgarity, the quality which lurks under the surface politeness of the French people and which showed itself in the disgraceful affair of the Charity Bazaar. You will then have a fair idea of the crowd and of its behavior. There is a certain naive and awkward simplicity about the White House receptions, but they are seldom ridiculous and never vulgar—this mainly because we don't go in, at Washington, for splendors beyond us. But here—let me give a few samples. About one-fourth of the men present walked around with their hands in their pockets, just observing things. Time and again, I saw the good wife of some middle-class family feeling of a curtain or examining closely the texture of the furniture. At the buffet, the pot-house politicians were gathered like flies. I observed them jostling and fighting off ladies who were trying to approach or reaching over their shoulders for provender. Once planted in the front row, they showed every variety of bad table manners except eating with their knives. Probably that was because they never learned how. In the smoking-room, I saw men helping themselves to cigars by the handful. In the salon diplomatique the ambassadors and others were gathered together away from the crowd. But the mob clustered round the open doors and discussed them as though it were a show for their benefit. The diplomats were a little "rattled" by this, and no wonder. The Japanese military attache became so embarrassed that he tangled himself up in his sword, and tumbled on the floor, whereat the crowd—guests, remember, under a stranger roof—laughed loud and boisterously. Twice, they tried to "rush" the guardians of the door and get into the forbidden ground. Who was it that called the French the "polite people of Europe"? And who was it that answered "I always suspect the quality in which a man or a nation takes greatest pride"?

I have come away from the Elysee with a deep and abiding respect for the manners of one person at least. President Loubet proved himself a gentleman and a diplomat. When he first took office, being dragged out from private life to straighten out the affairs of a tangled republic, he was shy and reticent and a little awkward. He is different now. His attitude was perfect. He was the host, genial, cordial, alert, but never less than the president. He had assumed just the right attitude, grasped the shade of difference between stiffness and loss of dignity. In my generation of service as a Washington correspondent, I remember only one American president who had acquired this manner; that was Cleveland, and I am persuaded that his marvelously clever wife was responsible for it more than he. For example: one or two people who had had dealings with him in an official way presumed on their position by appearing over-cordial and over-familiar when their turn came to shake his hand. These he would pass along with a conventional word or two, and, by way of rebuke, he would chat a half a minute with the next person in line, known or unknown. I saw this happen two or three times while I watched him. One of those who had just such a snub was M. Constant, the painter.

I fancy, however, that when it was all over M. Loubet sat him down and rubbed down his stiff right arm, and indulged in much the same disgust as I feel to-night for the French rabble and the awkward parade of democracy.

I passed by the Exposition site yesterday and went over to see the big house on the Bois de Boulogne set apart for royal and princely visitors to the big fair. It seems backward in preparation, as do all the other Exposition buildings, but I am assured by M. Girardon, the superintendent of the place, who showed me over the building, that everything will be done on time. They are overhauling the house thoroughly, leaving only the outer shell. The vestibules will be of marble, the parlors and salons of natural wood or of white and gold enamel. One of these is a Watteau room, with a ceiling of cupids and shepherdesses. These, and the smoking-rooms and dining-rooms on the second floor, are well advanced, so that one may see how admirably they are done, but the private apartments on the first floor are still in the hands of the plasterers. The building is not fireproof, yet here will dwell a hive of kings, princes and princelings from all over Europe. What a "snap" for an anarchist!

ASSESSMENT NOTICE.—MEXICAN GOLD and Silver Mining Company. Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the seventh day of March 1900, an assessment [No. 63] of fifteen [15] cents per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 79, Nevada block, No. 309 Montgomery street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the eleventh day of April, 1900, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before, will be sold on Wednesday, the Second day of May, 1900, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with the costs of advertising and expenses of sale.

By order of the Board of Directors.

CHAS. E. ELLIOT, Secretary.

Office—Room 79, Nevada block, No. 309 Montgomery street, San Francisco, California.

BABBLINGS OF A BELLE

THE second week of Lent, my dear Diary, is over and I feel that the time is coming for me to end all my youth. I do not mind it so much as I feared I should, for there are so many of the girls I know about to do the same thing. I live in a whirl of excitement—an excitement infinitely more paralyzing to my nerves than parties and balls. During the day there is so much planning for clothes that I have grown to hate the sight of the things; still, one must have them. Then, there are my walks which I take daily with my "Ideal," and our evenings spent either at home or at some small theatre party. Taking one thing with another I have hardly a moment to think of what is to be. Most of the girls I know are making me something to wear on the occasion. I never really imagined my popularity before. Fancy, I am the proud recipient of fine silver loving cups and a hundred and forty china cups. Half of them are from the men I have known in my three years, and a few are from Leila's specials. Leila's fiance sent me one of my loving cups and wrote asking me to endeavor to induce Leila to be as sensible as I am, and get married. However, Leila is a person of an exceedingly strong will, and I very much fear her best beloved will have to wait for her. Monday last, I went down to Burlingame to see the first real fox hunt. This poor animal had been brought from San Joaquin county, and gave the hounds a merry chase after him. It was a great sight; there is nothing like real fox-hunting, and all that this one lacked was numbers. There are so few people who ride, and so many who could. As I looked at all the girls I wondered why they did not go in for it. Think of the fun they would have. I never missed a paper chase, and think how infinitely more exciting a real fox hunt must be. Peter Martin told me that he thought in time that the Burlingame people would all take it up heart and soul, as they have golf and driving, but like all things out here, it takes time. I cannot see why people must grow accustomed to things before they take them up. Perhaps no one is quite sure enough of herself and cannot forget that there are others who might be apt to criticise her. After this hunt Mr. Carolan, the master of the hunt—an excellent one he makes, I think—was awarded the brush and one of the feet. Fortunately the fox had three others, one of which Mr. Beylard gave me in honor of my birthday, which was on that day. I believe there will be a hunt every Saturday now for a few months.

That evening mama gave a large dinner and theatre party afterwards to hear and see Damrosch, Bispham and Gadski. It was fine. The house was almost packed, and I really think the men are just as wild about these lecture concerts as the women. Mr. Damrosch is a creature of luck. Of course, he is awfully clever, and most attractive, but had it not been for his father I do not think he would be in the position he is to-day. In the middle of an opera season in New York, his father, who was the great conductor, died suddenly. Walter immediately took his place, and though at first he seemed hardly capable, different people who were interested in him helped and encouraged him to such an extent that he eventually became a quite worthy successor of a great father. His name helped him, too. Damrosch senior was so prominent and people who are not directly interested in conductors do not remember whether it be the father or son that they know. I could hardly believe it was the season of abstinence and fasting from the appearance of the Palace Hotel supper room after that concert. It was crowded with all the representative people in town. After all, I believe this idea of pretending to keep Lent is naught but a delusion and a snare. The afternoon services at the churches, however, are pretty fairly patronized, but there are not so many girls at them as there have been other years. How well I remember my first season. We would no more have missed the afternoon service than an engagement with our best crush. But that was three years ago. Things and time do muchly change in three years.

Tuesday I went around the links twice with the "ideal." He is now golf crazy. I am not, but I go around with him, and now and then he insists with that exquisitely subtle insistance of the man in love that I take a shot, just to see how fascinating it is. But I fear it will take a good long time to work me up to the right pitch. If it should arrive, after I am married, and I should, as so many of the girls do, spend my entire day on the links, I wonder what sort of a house we should have. To play golf well, evidently, it is necessary to put in all one's time at it, and that for a young house-keeper would be a fearful state of affairs. Still, I may come to it yet under the grinding hand of an ideal lover. It was a tremendous triumph for the Presidio Club to have Mary Scott play so well in Oakland and beat Alice Moffitt, whom we really all consider the best girl player on the coast. I hope when Mary goes abroad she will play matches with some of the English girls and beat them. I am quite sure her form could not be better. Mary Crocker and she expect to spend a year travelling, starting some time in April. Mrs. Mosely is to chaperone them, and they will first spend some time in China and Japan. I expect they will have a glorious trip. The Scotts are now at their home in Burlingame. A good many other San Francisco people are out of town. The McBeans, Mrs. Casey and Katherine Dillon are all at Coronado to remain until after Lent. I believe golf is the order of the day there, as it is at every other resort now-a-days.

I spent a day with Mary Crocker last week. That girl did have a glorious winter in New York. Her descriptions of the different balls, dinners and opera parties made me just long to go on there. Everything in the entertainment way is so much more elaborate than what we ever dream of here. From Mary's descriptions the gowns must be wonderful. What I really envied her most were the opera parties; just think of the joy of hearing the best singers in the world once or twice every week. It seems too much like a glimpse of heaven. Mary is just the same as when she left; in fact she is one of the girls who could not be spoiled by attention. Like most of our San Francisco girls, she is infinitely too well balanced to allow society to change her a little bit.

The wedding of Beatrice Tobin and Mr. Charles Raoul Duval took place on Saturday at noon. Beatrice looked awfully well in white satin and real lace. I never saw her figure set off to better advantage and her golden-brown hair made her look a veritable picture. Agnes and Celia Tobin were the maids of honor. There were only a few other people there besides me, and we had a really jolly time. Mr. Duval is an absolute man of the world and I think Beatrice and he will have fine times together. They are so congenial in their tastes and I look forward to having a great old time when I visit them next September at their home in Hempstead, Long Island. Now, Diary dear, I think I have told you all the news of the week and, considering it is Lent, we are not so very dull.

The Moet & Chandon White Seal Champagne now being sold cannot be equaled in quality by any other brand. It is of the celebrated vintage of 1893, and has been pronounced by ablest experts superior to any other brand.

Paur says: "The playing of the pianola in my house last evening was a treat, as well as a surprise. Nothing of the kind I have ever heard before can approach it. In the hands of a competent player all the shading, crescendo, as well as modification of tempi, are remarkably accurate." Kohler & Chase, sole agents, 26 and 30 O'Farrell St.

Marvelous Champagne Figures.

109,303 cases of G. H. Mumm's Extra Dry were imported in 1899, being 72,495 cases more than any other brand. Carrying an immense stock of choicest wines, its quality will always be maintained. Its 1895 vintage now imported is exceptionally fine.

THE LADY OF LUCERNE.

THE night was brilliant in the glory of the full moon; the lake a sheet of polished silver, and the snow-capped mountains incomparably grand in their dark contrast. As we strolled along the promenade beneath the trees that shade the park in front of the Schweitzerhof, my fair companion's presence swept over me like a tidal wave. My patient wife, waiting for me in her room at the hotel, was forgotten, drowned as I was in the starry depths of those wonderful eyes of this foreign enchantress, whose name, even, I did not know.

Several times we had passed each other in our stroll under the trees, and each time, with a shamefaced sense of mutual confusion, our eyes had met. How my heart throbbed when, moved by an impulse, I had asked and been given permission to join her!

She had a winsome fascination that gave me as she clung to my arm a strange sensation of dreamy half stupor.

She was one of those women whose nearness has a significance, and the vague, quick clinging of her rustling skirts about my heels made me forget everything save her. When she expressed a desire to return to the hotel I strove in vain to detain her.

The happy dream was over.

We retracted our steps, until with a sudden impulse, she touched my arm, then, before I was aware of her intentions, there, in the very shadow of the portico, she kissed me once—twice—thrice.

'Dream of me!" she whispered. She was gone—vanished! I went in eager search of her, but my search was vain, and I turned sulkily and made my way back to the hotel, up the stairs and through the long corridors to my apartments.

I scarcely realized where I was. I hummed an old love song as I went, and when, on opening the door of my room, I discovered my waiting wife, I started as from a dream in ill-concealed surprise.

For an instant she stared at me perplexedly, and then, nervous little woman that she is, she screamed.

"Hush! hush! my dear!" I pleaded; you'll awaken the house. What is the matter? It is only I."

She tottered over to where I was standing.

"What—has—happened?" she asked, evidently much perturbed.

"Happened!" I repeated, my nerve coming back to me, "nothing has happened. What do you mean?"

"Your watch! Your diamond scarf pin! Your sleeve links!"

Hastily I felt for my possessions, my actions following her exclamations. They were gone—each, all. I thrust my hand into my breast pocket. My wallet, containing my letter of credit and our steamer tickets, were also missing.

I had, indeed, been touched.

VACCINATION.—A graceful young woman sitting in a New Orleans street car attracted the attention of the passengers by her beauty and the air of good style with which her clothes were worn. When it came her time to alight, she touched the button and rose from her seat. The car stopped with the invariable jerk as she reached the door. Seeing her stagger the conductor put his hand on her arm. It was a perfectly respectful action and kindly meant. The haughty beauty recoiled; her eyes blazed. "Don't touch me sir," she exclaimed, with a harshness that shocked everyone in the car. The conductor flushed and retreated to his platform, while the young woman got off. "Well I must say" remarked one of the passengers addressing the car, "that was about the most painful exhibition of superciliousness I ever witnessed in my life." There was a murmur of approval, in the midst of which the conductor thrust a smiling face through the doorway. "Don't blame de young lady, gents," he said cheerily. "She didn't mean nothin'. You see, she's been vaccinated and has a sore arm."

JUSTICE.—While M. Constans, the artist, was spending a day with President Loubet at Rambouillet he was asked by his host upon what subject he was now engaged. "M. le President," said the other, "I am painting a big canvas symbolising Justice." "Indeed; and how do you conceive her?" Whereat the painter began to describe his ideal in glowing words, speaking from the heart as only an artist can when delivering his soul to a sympathetic listener. But the president quietly interrupted him with a twinkle in his eye. "Is that how you conceive Justice?" he said. "Parfait! And now would you like to know what she really is, in point of fact, and in actual life?" He rummaged in his pocket and produced a coin, which he spun in the air. "Head or tail!" he said. "That is justice!"

A TEST OF STRENGTH.—An Irish recruit in the 4th Cavalry, while off the Farallones on the troopship Sherman, succumbed to the swell of the Pacific and like the majority of his company began to pay tribute to Neptune. The captain in charge of the draft was passing along the deck, putting a kind word here and a sentence of encouragement there. He came to "Mike," and, stopping beside him, said: "You're pretty bad, my lad." "Oi am," said the soldier, trying to stand at attention and salute his superior, "an' oi' suppose th' docthor can't do anythin' fur me?" "I'm afraid not. Poor fellow, you have a weak stomach." The Irishman bristled: "Oi don't know about thot," he gasped. "Oi notice oi'm throwin' as far as anny av the rest av thim."

NYE WAS SURPRISED.—The Woman's Relief Corps of Madison, Ind. arranged to get up a benefit entertainment for their organization and communicated with Bill Nye and James Whitcomb Riley requesting their presence for the occasion. Unfortunately the scheme was not favored by the townspeople and but seven tickets were disposed of. However, Nye and Riley arrived in due course and it devolved on the manager of the theatre to break to them the failure of the enterprise. Riley listened to the sad news without comment, but Nye turned to his partner. "Only seven tickets sold, Jim. That's funny, because the people of this town have never heard us."

HIS IMPARTIALITY.—In a murder trial in Dallas, Texas, the counsel for the defence was examining a venire-man regarding his qualifications to serve, an objection having been raised on the ground of the juror's prejudice against negroes. The man admitted that he had once been a member of a jury which tried a negro for murder. It is not permissible in such cases to ask the result of the trial, so, in the hope of eliciting information, the counsel said, "Where is that negro now?" "I don't know," was the reply. "The sheriff hanged him at the appointed time!"

BREAKING IT GENTLY.—A Southern planter had a colored 'ostler who was much in awe of his employer. The man was apologetic over trifles, but when his master's favorite horse died one night the case seemed to be beyond the groom's power of palliation. He wandered about the stable-yard for a long time lost in thought. Then, going to the planter, he said, "Guv'nor, that yere black horse, Pluto, ain't a-goin' to live berry long." "What makes you say that, Ben?" asked the governor in surprise. "Case he am dead," was the reply.

THE TRAMP'S SPECIALTY.—A sure enough tramp applied at the home of Squire Schwab at Avondale for something to eat. The applicant made a most pathetic plea for food, but the stony heart of the Squire didn't melt. "If you'll chop that ice off the front pavement I guess we can stake you to a meal." "I'm sorry," said the tramp, "but my specialty is sprinkling lawns."

PALAE and GRAND HOTELS

For nearly a quarter of a century these Hotels have been the recognized headquarters for Tourists and Travelers visiting San Francisco.

Their popularity has been acquired by reason of their unique location (being accessible to wholesale and shipping districts and amusement centers), the peculiar excellence of cuisine and service, and moderate charges.

The Grill Rooms for ladies and gentlemen have an international reputation, and the recently added Supper Room is now recognized as the place to obtain after-theatre refreshments.

EVENTS CURRENT.

The Open-Door Agreement.

The government has just published its diplomatic correspondence regarding the "open-door" policy in China. It is the first definite statement concerning a matter which has up to this time been largely obscured. From these papers it appears that the administration has achieved its object—equal commercial rights in China—and scored a distinct diplomatic achievement. The six greatest powers interested in the Celestial empire, viz , Germany, Russia, Great Britain, Italy, France and Japan, have signified their concurrence to the convention. Some of the powers agreed willingly and some only under pressure, but all have given their categorical consent in writing. It is suspected that Russia was one of the dissenters. The full consent is as follows: "First—That each, within its sphere of influence or leased territory in China, should pledge itself not in any way to interfere with any treaty port or vested right within the sphere or territory under lease. Second—That in all the ports within the spheres of influence, except free ports, all merchandise landed or shipped, irrespective of nationality, shall pay the Chinese treaty tariff for the time being, and the duties shall be paid to the Chinese government. Third—That in the ports in the spheres of influence the government controlling that sphere will levy no greater harbor duties on vessels of any nationality than are levied on vessels of its own nationality, and that on railroads built, controlled or operated within these spheres the citizens of other nationalities shall be required to pay no higher charges for transportation of merchandise than are paid by citizens of the powers controlling such spheres." This means that American merchants may trade as freely within the sphere of influence of any other government as though the United States were in control of that region. It directly prepares the way for the rapid growth of American trade in China, expanding our market indefinitely, and giving us access to parts of the empire which were formerly closed to us. For China itself it is a benefit in that it protects the Chinese right of levying tariff and regulates duties. The Republican and non-partisan press of the country speak of this agreement as a great diplomatic triumph for Secretary of State John Hay, who conducted the negotiations.

South Africa Still Quiet.

The third week of the quiet state between the first and second campaigns of the Transvaal war has resulted a little less favorably for the Brit sh. The relief of Mafeking, which was exp cted by this time, is delayed indefinitely. The censorship has lifted sufficiently to show that four columns are moving on the city from different directions. Colonel Plumer's force, the one which has seemed all along to have the bes chance of success, met with a reverse in the only engagement of the week, and was forced to fall back to a point twenty miles further away than the former base. Commandant Snyman, who led the Boer defence in this fight, then fell back and resumed the siege of the town. From the garrison at Mafeking there is not a word. In the earlier days of the siege a native runner would break through the lines every few days, bearing dispatches. The fact that none of these messengers have got t rough for ten days indicates either that the Boer lines are drawn tighter or that the natives of the town are too reduced by hardship and hunger to carry the dispatches. Lord Methuen has had charge of the relief of Mafeking, and his failure is another blemish on the repu ation so severely damaged at Modder river and Magersfontein. The influence of the Guards saved him before, but if he fails this ime he will probably be held to answer, since he was given the Mafeking task that he might clear his reputation, as White, Gatacre and Buller have already done. Roberts holds his army in Bloemfontein, making no advance. Part of this inaction is undoubtedly due to the necessity of re-arranging his transport system, and part of it may be due to an effort to conciliate the Free Staters. It it is now pretty certain that, whatever the Boers of the Orange Free State may do, the Transvaal will not yield until a final trial of strength has been made in their own borders. Kruger and Roberts are each accusing t e other side of using expanding and explosive bullets, contrary to the uses of war. In the case of the Boers, this seems to be pretty well proved. Soft-nosed bullets and dum-dums were found on soldiers taken with Cronje, or dug up from hiding places in captured kraals. Practically the whole Orange Free State is abandoned to the British. The Boers hold Kroonstadt, just in front of General Kitchener s lines, in force, but the position is un enable, as it is open to flank a tack by the superior British cavalry. The Boers in Natal are falling back to Laing's Nek, where General Buller will have his first great fight in the invasion of Transvaal proper. He is stationary now, and will probably wait to time his attack with Roberts.

The Future of the Boer Republics.

When Great Britain first undertook the war against the Boer republics, it was not at all certain that a British victory would mean the loss of their liberty or even that a majority of the ruling party would favor absolute British sovereignty. Now, public opinion in Great Britain has changed to such an extent that the leaders of the war party join Chamberlain in his watchword "The Boer republics must go." Almost the last to take this view is Lord Salisbury, whose opinion now counts for more than that of any other one person in the empire. He enjoys the unlimited confidence of the Crown, the government, parliament, and the nation, and, while his quiet methods and objection to show tend to lessen the estimate of his influence, his is really the ultimate voice in the decision of British policies. The fact that he has decided against the Boer governments is a matter of importance. He has no sympathy with gold-hunters and he is a man whose traditions and sentiments are against such a war as is being waged in South Africa. He would never have taken a stand against Boer sovereignty had not investigation convinced him that the existence of the republics across the border would be a permanent menace to order and peace in South Africa. This decision of Salisbury's is one of the great events of the war. The hot anti-Boer party with Chamberlain at the head is gaining ground continually. In the last fortnight, especially, has the party favoring independence for the two republics dwindled. The grace with which a part of Orange Free State has accepted British rule is an encouragement for the strong imperialists, while even such advocates of independence as Bryce and Courtney are now holding out only for generous autonomy. What is Salisbury's idea as to the character of this future colony may only be guessed. It is doubtful if he favors an absolute crown colony across the Orange, river and the Vaal. A colony under liberal government like that of Canada is much more probable. One consideration which carries weight with the Premier proves the foresight of his statesmanship. It is said that he favors moulding his new government for the Dutch rather than the British, because he realizes that when the mines give out, which must happen in time, the prevalent race will again be the Dutch, who prefer farming to mining. Chamberlain is, of course, much more exacting than Salisbury, and is for a "government from Downing street" direct. The longer the war is drawn out and the more insolent are Kruger, Leyds and the other leaders of the non-progressive party in Transvaal, the more power will accrue to Chamberlain and the harder will be the final terms.

Aftermath of the Goebel Murder.

In the disturbed state of Kentucky, with two sets of officials still holding office, the Democratic side, holding somewhat the stronger position, is making an effort to run down the murderer or murderers of Senator Goebel, assassinated as he was about to be declared elected governor of the state. Ever since the shooting the Democratic courts have been prosecuting a quiet investigation. This resulted in the arrest of Caleb Powers, secretary of state on the Republican ticket. He is now undergoing preliminary examination in Frankfort. The sensational witness against him has been one F. W. Golden, who claims to have been partially admitted into a plot to kill Goebel and other leading Democrats and to have turned state's evidence. He is a mountaineer, a leader among his people and a sergeant in the state militia summoned by Governor Taylor to defend the Republican administration. He alleges that Powers and other prominent men in the party gathered a great number of "feudists" from all over Kentucky in order to "kill enough Democrats to insure a majority." Later, he was given details of the plot against Goebel. Three mulattos were picked to do the job. One of these, Richard Coombs by name, is the person most strongly suspected. Golden claims to have lost sight of the conspiracy for a day or so before the tragedy occurred. His testimony does not implicate Taylor, but it involves two or three other high Republicans. Other witnesses have testified that the fatal shot came from Caleb Power's office. The testimony adduced is thought to be amply sufficient to hold Powers on the charge of conspiracy to murder. A force of militia, summoned by the Democratic governor, surrounds the court-house where the trial is in progress, and the state house is guarded by another body of state troops, summoned by the Republican claimant, Taylor.

Woman Suffrage in Colorado.

John Cotton Dana of Springfield, Mass., contributes to a late issue of the New York Times a short but strong article on woman suffrage in Colorado, of which he has been an observer from the beginning. Equal suffrage has been in practice in Colorado for six years altogether, long enough for a fair trial. It will be a little disconcerting to both sides to hear this evidently fair-minded observer assert that it has produced very little practical change either way. When the suffrage was first conferred on Colorado women, they began the study of their new civic rights with great enthusiasm. They had the right to vote, they considered it their duty to vote, and for a time they took it up with zeal. Then, Mr. Dana says, they looked about them and were surprised to see how little it had availed. There was no great and surprising and sudden change in the administration of affairs through this addition of the moral element to the voting population. There was no noteworthy change in political methods, no addition to the effectiveness of city, county or state government. It is true that they were an uncertain factor in politics, and the ward politician found that they were not moved by parades and rallies and the other instruments of frenzied partisanship. But another means, just as easy and as shallow, attracted them and was used by the heelers—suave, personal appeal. A woman who could not be influenced by a brass band or a rally could be won over by a smooth talk within a half an hour of voting time. This did away with much of the old-time campaigning and it rendered politics less certain but no purer or better. The uncertainty was not as to whether "reform" candidates or "gang" candidates should secure elections, but as to which of the two old gangs should have the upper hand. What had formerly been a science became a game. This has been the only change in the methods of government after six years of suffrage. Many educated and enlightened women gave up their votes when they learned this, and many more would do so did they not believe that their votes are needed to offset the ignorant female vote. The right to vote is now granted them and can hardly be relinquished. But to the passing observer, Colorado woman suffrage works as though it were not. If it is ever to produce marked changes in human society, in Colorado or elsewhere, it will not be until women have learned the worthlessness of the direct appeal and developed political foresight. This is the case in general terms. In a few ways, however, Colorado women have improved the administration of the state and municipal government. They have proved that, when they try, they can make a city's polling places clean and decent, that they can learn what results are expected of a city department, the street-cleaning services for example, that they can fill certain positions in the state with credit, and that they have a certain force, though by no means so great a one as might be expected, in the regulation of drinking, gambling, and the social evil. It is not true, as some assert, that they have lost deference in the eyes of men; rather have they gained. Men add to the respect due to their sex the respect due to equals. But only one change of importance can be said to be due to woman suffrage—the acquisition for Colorado women of a broader view of human society in general. And this is subjective rather than practical. The suppression of gang politics, the great merit claimed for suffrage by its advocates, has not been accomplished in the slightest degree. The women vote; the gangs change their methods, and their is no improvement.

Finances of the Russian Empire.

There is a general impression in this country that Russia is in a bad way financially. It is known that some of the late experiments of the Czar's government, notably the Trans-Siberian Railway, have cost immense sums, and cannot possibly earn immediate interest on the investment. It is known also that the government has just finished revising the currency system. As the change has been from a silver to a gold standard, the Bryanite press of the United States has not been slow in spreading and exaggerating the report. The other side of the question is now pressing for a hearing. M. de Routkowsky, Russian financial agent in the United States, has issued a statement of the Muscovite nation's financial condition. He declares that the English enemies of Russia and not the free silver advocates are responsible for most of these reports. Instead of wrecking the country's finances, the introduction of the gold standard has wrought a most wonderful reform. Previous to 1897 silver was the standard of value, the unit being a rouble, containing 18.02 grains of pure silver, equal to 100 kopecks and to 1.161 grains of pure gold. Up to 1854, silver and state credit notes circulated at par; then, wars and increase in expenses brought about a forty-year period of commercial depression. At the end of that time, the government decided that the adoption of a gold standard was the true remedy. The Czar's officials began to accumulate gold, and had, in 1896, over 1,200,000,000 roubles in gold in the treasury. With this reserve as a basis, the Currency Reform Law was put into effect. The value of the silver rouble had meanwhile fallen from 100 kopecks to 45. The value of a credit note for one rouble was worth on exchange only about 66 kopecks. These were redeemed at that rate, and then gold was proclaimed the standard by imperial ukase. It may be remembered that this action had something to do with the slump in American silver which caused our own panic of 1893. The unit of value under the new system is a rouble containing .7742 grains of gold, equal to about 51.45 cents of American money. The State Bank of Russia was made the standard credit institution authorized to issue exchange notes. The exchange was guaranteed by the gold reserve in the treasury, by the state forest reserve of 900,000,000 acres, and by the state railroads. Since that time, the amount of money in circulation has increased from 1,102,300,000 roubles to 1,360,600,000 roubles, and the amount of gold in circulation has nearly doubled. The circulation of silver has increased by six times, while that of notes has decreased one-half. Anyone who has sufficient security may borrow money at the state banks at the current rate of interest. The stock of gold in the country has increased rather than diminished. The ratio of bank reserve to outstanding notes is 167 to 100. This is claimed to be the largest percentage of reserve in any European state bank. Since the new program went into operation there has been only one year—1891—when the expenditures exceeded the revenues of the empire. These figures, the Russian financial agent declares, prove that the stories of Russian financial instability are absurd. In conclusion, he says: "If one considers that it was only in 1861 that the great bulk of the population was freed from serfdom and land was allotted to each community of peasants, one must admit that the results achieved are such as one may be proud of, and that they give a firm conviction of the great and inexhaustible economical resources of the Russian people, who do not envy the prosperity of other nations, but desire to be left unhampered in the peaceful development of the resources and prosperity of their own country and in the pursuits of happiness, without encroaching on the right of other nations."

Women as Employees.

A CLASS in economic science at one of our great Pacific Coast universities held a discussion, recently, concerning the rate of wages paid to women as compared to men in the same grade of employment. After nearly a score of possible causes had been advanced and discussed the professor in charge closed the matter abruptly. "You have missed the main point," he said. "It is because they do not perform the work so well."

Now, the fact that a university professor says that a thing is so does not by any means make it so, but this dictum, radical as it is, must appeal to any practical man of affairs who has had to do extensively with women as wage-earners. A very superficial study of labor statistics should prove this point. In the last year of prosperity, more women were discharged from employment, in proportion to the number employed, than in any other year since labor statistics have been kept. Ardent advocates of woman's rights will say that this is because of the opposition of prejudiced men to the employment of women. But prejudice does not enter into business to such an extent as to influence a whole great body of the workers. If the employment of women paid, it could be put down as an absolute certainty that they would be employed, no matter how great the sentimental feeling against it.

We are at the turn of the tide as regards the "business woman." All great changes in politics or economics go by the swing of a pendulum. That is, when a movement for the reform of a long-standing abuse gets under way, it almost invariably goes too far at first. Then, the time comes for the back swing of the pendulum, a retrograde movement toward a golden mean. The conspicuous and hackneyed example is the French Revolution, wherein the rage for liberty went beyond all bounds of sense and touched anarchy. Yet after the pendulum had made three or four swings, back and forth, France settled down to a condition of comparatively just and orderly freedom. The first move in the so-called "economic emancipation of women" occurred in 1870 or thereabouts. The movement was in full operation by 1880; by 1890 it had passed the golden mean; it was at its extreme height two or three years ago. The wholesale discharge of women wage-earners last year was the beginning of the pendulum's backward swing.

It is no discredit to women to say that they are incompetent to fill most of the business positions they have sought to occupy. It is a rare woman who has the mere physical strength to stand the strain of modern business life as well as a man. It is a still rarer one who has the strength, force and grasp of mind to rise above a merely subordinate position and accept a place wherein executive ability is necessary. That women are unequal to the physical strain is proved by some investigations conducted recently by an Eastern publication. It was found that in the last few years the hospitals and sanitariums of the country had noted an alarming increase in the number of women and girls suffering from nervous collapse or from other causes directly traceable to overwork. And the overwhelming majority of women so treated were workers and not home-builders. With regard to the assertion that women are rarely competent to hold positions of direction and executive responsibility, consider that in teaching, the employment which is their own beyond all others, the higher places are filled by men. The graded schools of this country employ women as simple teachers almost to the exclusion of the other sex, but it is extremely rare to find a woman acting as a principal. The ordinary female teacher, if she does not marry, stays in a subordinate position all her life; the men who enter the profession consider themselves failures if they do not come to be principals within a few years. It is a business proposition. Women cannot stand it, employers have learned it, and they are being shelved by the merciless law of self-interest, which requires that a business man who is to keep up with modern competition must have the best help that he can obtain for his price or go to the wall. A set of men physically unfit for hard work would be crowded out with the same merciless abruptness. Then the uncertainty caused by matrimonial chances has had its share of blame. When a business man employs an assistant, he generally expects that the employe is taking up the pursuit as a life work, and that he will use his best powers to develop experience. There is no such expectation with the average young woman, who may marry at any time. The conventionalities which hedge about the honest woman come in as another cause. Employers hesitate to ask a female clerk or assistant to work long overtime; they hesitate to send her on a long journey or to any place where she will be alone with men. Neither does a male employer, if he be a gentleman, feel free to reprimand his female employees. And all these reasons go back to one conclusion: women in business are in an unnatural position. They were not made for it. The normal woman in active life is like the natural plumber trying to be an artist or the natural artist trying to be a plumber. This is not saying that woman is man's inferior. That idea went out of the world long ago; she is man's equal, but on a different range.

It is not claimed that the movement toward the freer employment of women will not prove to be for good in the end, when the pendulum stops and conditions become stable. So long as there is sentiment in the world, just so long will certain women refuse to marry for reasons sufficient to themselves and to be respected by others. So long as there is injustice and uncertainty in the world, a certain number of women, having married, will yet be thrown upon their own resources and forced to earn a living for themselves and their children. Before 1870, the avenues of employment for such women were few and narrow and crowded. Domestic service, sewing and teaching was the list. Now the feminine rage for masculine work has made almost all branches of business "respectable" for women. It has widened opportunity and ameliorated conditions for this class, and in this sense it has been an immense benefit. Beyond this it is a menace to the home, and to women in general, because whatever threatens the home threatens women more than men.

Candidate Bryan's Campaign.

WM. J. BRYAN has opened his campaign. The route he has marked out for himself and for Democracy to follow in the coming contest does not lie along exalted lines. The printed account of the speech does not contain a sentence or a sentiment that is calculated to appeal to or change the mind of any intelligent voter who supported McKinley. There is danger in a man of the Bryan type only where ignorance, and hate, and envy, and discontent abide. In a land of drought and empty granaries, in an idle and workless community, where business is stagnant and prejudice and envy alone are active, then the Bryan type is welcome. The thoughtless fellow who is carried away with fantastic rhetorical nothings, with catch phrases and amusing but meaningless illustrations, is very apt to consider Mr. Bryan a great man mentally. But Mr. Bryan does not appeal to the understanding. As a statesman he is an omelet souffle which someone described as a "big nothing." If Mr. Bryan is to have his way, we will probably hear it repeated and repeated that the Republican party places the "dollar above the man," because it fails to adopt the English system of an income tax. Then again Mr. Hanna is to be made the butt of Democratic ridicule. Republicans will be asked to accept the Democratic estimate of Mr. Hanna, and reasoning from that basis argue themselves into the camp of Democracy. Mr. Bryan draws a comparison between the present and the old Republican leaders. He holds up Lincoln at one end and Hanna at the other and then treats his audience to some coarse wit at the expense of the Ohio Senator. While instituting comparisons, let Mr. Bryan compare himself and his flamboyant utterances with those of Jefferson or any other leader of Democracy. The cheap, tinselled, loud, rounding sentiments of Bryan beside the wisdom, the learning and the modesty of Jefferson is so painful as to make one wonder that Bryan dare to set the public mind in the direction of instituting comparisons. Mr. Hanna has not sought to fill President Lincoln's seat; Mr. Bryan does aspire to serve where Jefferson served.

COMMUNICATIONS.

Whitelaw Reid and the Porto Rico Problem.

HON. WHITELAW REID, journalist, diplomat and ex-Paris Peace Commissioner, delivered an address at the State University at Berkeley on Charter Day, the 21st inst. His subject was, "Problems Resultant from the Spanish-American War."

It is not the purpose of the writer to undertake to make rejoinder to, or even to comment at any length upon, the remarks of Mr. Reid. He did not undertake to justify what has been done and what is sought to be done by the Administration in regard to the insular possessions which have come to us as fruit of our triumph over Spain. He merely pleaded in extenuation that what is done is done, and we must make the best of it; that expediency sometimes forces itself to a position of paramountcy over theoretical principle, and that as a great nation having a great mission, with destiny beckoning us on, we must not stop to parley over Constitutional technicalities, but we must throw aside any trivial entrammelment or hampering and press forward to the mark of our high calling among the nations of earth as the evangel of liberty, even if we have to subject other peoples to our rule in order to make them participants in and beneficiaries of our particular brand of liberty.

The purpose of this communication is to oppose to Mr. Reid's oracular dictum concerning the authority of Congress to treat Puerto Rico as territory under the jurisdiction of the United States without the purview of the Constitution, opinions that have been handed down by some of the most eminent jurists as interpreters of the Constitution that this country has ever had.

Chief Justice Tawney, in the famous Dred Scott decision, said:

"A power in the general government to obtain and hold colonies and dependent territories over which they (the Congress) might legislate without restriction would be inconsistent with its own existence in its present form."

That is to say, under the Constitution unamended, there is no power given Congress to govern any territory of the United States as a colony.

Again: We read in the case of Shively vs. Bowlby, 152 U. S. Vol. 1:

"The territories acquired by Congress, whether by deeds of cession from the original states or by treaty with a foreign country, are held with the object, as soon as their population and condition justify it, of being admitted into the Union as states upon an equal footing with the original states in all respects."

If this means anything, it means that the United States should not and may not acquire and hold any territory where conditions tribal, geographical and climatic preclude that territory ultimately being admitted to statehood.

To fortify the opinions quoted, we will invoke the interpretation of Judge Cooley, whose commentaries are everywhere and by everybody accepted as highest authority. In his Principles of Constitutional Law, he says:

"And when territory is acquired, the right to suffer states to be formed therefrom and to receive them into the Union must follow, of course, not only because the Constitution confers the power to admit new states without restriction, but also because it would be inconsistent with institutions founded on the fundamental idea of self-government that the Federal Government should retain territory under its own imperial rule and deny the people the customary local institutions."

One of the local institutions unalterably guaranteed by the Constitution to all territory under United States jurisdiction is free trade. How, then, will it be possible for Congress to impose customs tariffs upon products passing between Puerto Rico and the United States, or the Philippines and the United States if those island territories are made parts integral, or as detached dependencies of the United States?

As to the latter status, it is clearly shown that until the Constitution shall have been amended, the United States Congress nor the Chief Executive has not the prerogative to hold and govern any territory as a colonial dependency. Wherefore, the question resolves itself into this: "Will we be governed by the Constitution or will we not?"

JOHN AUBREY JONES.

The Spring Valley Again.

LAST week a number of Supervisors from San Francisco visited San Mateo county and inspected the storage facilities of the Spring Valley water works, with a view, as I understand, of arriving at some impression of the magnitude and extent of its improvements, so as to form an intelligent or quasi-intelligent idea as to the value of the plant which the city of San Francisco contemplates purchasing and conducting as a municipal enterprise. I freely confess to an ignorance of the law, but it does seem to me that hidden away in this question is a point that has not received proper attention. I have no doubt it would be perfectly legal and proper for one city and county to purchase, own and operate water works where the water is drawn from wells, springs or streams wholly within its own boundaries, but I do not think the law should sanction the stripping of all water from one county for the benefit of another. The Spring Valley Water Company, a private corporation, has by purchase acquired about every valuable water right within the county of San Mateo. It is a private corporation, subject to state, as well as to municipal regulation. It is conceivable that should the private corporation refuse to sell water to the inhabitants of San Mateo it might be compelled to do so by the courts or by the law. But the municipality of San Francisco, it seems to me, could scarcely engage in the business of purveying water to individuals of another municipality. There are any number of cases where rival towns located within a few miles of each other have engaged in rivalries both prolonged and bitter. If it is permissible for one city government to acquire and control all of the natural and all of the possible water supply of its rival, the downfall of the opposition town could be readily accomplished through the acquisition of its water supply and a refusal to furnish water to the inhabitants of the less wealthy and less progressive community. This, it seems to me, would not be a proper or a lawful proceeding.

The riparian owners along San Mateo creek sold to the Spring Valley Company their rights as riparian owners, but, query: has not the county itself and neighboring inhabitants a right as yet undefined? Have not neighboring municipalities, towns and cities a right to demand that water originating in proximity thereto should not be impounded and diverted to distant municipalities, have they not a right to demand a supply of this water? Will the editor of the Wave throw a little light on this subject, and oblige

A RESIDENT OF SAN MATEO.

The editor of the Wave does not believe that the city of San Francisco will ever acquire the Spring Valley Water Works. Supervisors and mayors may come and go; the socialist may bellow and roar; but after all they cannot "get something for nothing." The bonds and stock of the water company have a marketable value at which they may be purchased, but that public officials, whether backed by engineers' estimates and popular vote or not, may arbitrarily fix a price and compel the corporation to sell at that figure, we strongly doubt.

The point raised by our correspondent, that cities contiguous to a water supply cannot be denied water (at fair rates) is novel, and we imagine if the Spring Valley Company's articles of incorporation were amended so as to empower it to furnish water to the town of San Mateo and neighboring cities, and if it did in fact furnish such terms with water, that such fact would, in the eyes of the law, rather act as an obstruction to the San Francisco socialist.

In Cuba, no one ever goes barefoot. The children of the poor in the country run stark naked in every respect but one; they always wear a pair of slippers or sandals. The reason for this is the prevalence of the lockjaw bacillus in the soil. The least scratch on the foot is likely to be fatal.

Native Women Of Luzon

NATIVE OF THE PROVINCE OF ALBAY, LUZON.

IF THE Filipino men had the same tastes as I have, none of them would ever marry, and the Tagalog race would die out, which might be a good thing. The Filipino is flat-faced, heavy-waisted, stolid, dull, uninteresting. The Japanese women are homely of feature, and unfaithful of heart, but they are sweet, fluttering little birdlings and a perpetual delight. You know that one of them would smile on you while she let her brother pick your pockets, but that doesn't alter her charm in the least. The Kanaka woman has no waist-line and waddles when she walks, but there is a world-depth in her eyes and a softness in her soul which would make a Ulysses stop. But in the Filipino woman I see no charms of body or mind. She has great, black eyes, it is true, but they are as soulless as a crockery egg. When you view her from the front, you look straight into her nostrils, such is the tilt of her nose. Her hair is like a horse's mane. Her gait is slouchy. She has no feminine accomplishments, not even cooking. She shows less taste in dress than an Indian squaw. She will caress and dandle you in her hut while her husband goes out to raise a gang of bolomen to chop you to pieces on the way home. She is as expert a pickpocket by nature as an American ever becomes by the longest practice.

But tastes differ; else, there would be no Filipino race, and a certain native dandy in white duck would not be desecrating night with his knotty voice and a native guitarita, serenading his lady-love. He is putting on entirely too much front, that man; he is an imitator of the Spanish. There is really no need of going to all that trouble, because marriage down here is a simple, easy and business-like arrangement which differs from a Yankee horse-trade only in its cheapness. When a youth comes to marriageable age, he takes unto himself a wife from among the eligible maidens in the neighborhood. There is not much choice in the matter. He pays the money and takes the goods. If there is a priest handy and he can afford the added luxury, they have a marriage ceremony, but it is not really necessary, only a little extra "dog." The books will tell you that the natives down here lead Christian family lives and are true to the marriage tie. Our cook, old "Recon"—a nickname abbreviated from "reconcentrado" and given because he is always hungry—has a household of three, one old and two young. I had supposed that the younger ones were his daughters; but no, they are all his wives.

Decidedly, our friend with the querita is foolish. He needs only to sit down and let matrimony come his way. I had three proposals last week, and am now keeping off the women with a club, since it is noised about that I am a candidate for marriage. I am no beauty, either.

My first chance came Sunday evening. I was lolling on a bench on the outskirts of the village of Bulican. Three native women came strolling my way. With fine, Castilian courtesy, I made room for them on the bench. The largest and homeliest of the three—she was smoking a nine inch cigar—opened the subject:

"You have wife back there?" I replied that I was heart-free. She looked me over from head to foot, calmly, critically; then she spoke in a business-like manner:

"Poco tempo you matrimony Filipino, no? How you lika me?"

I was thunderstruck, but I took up the argument on a commercial basis.

"Oh, I get only thirty pesos a month. You can't marry on that."

"Thirty pesos! Mucho dinero! You rent mucha granda nipa hut for one peso, and for four pesos we live mucha granda. I cook bueno. You wanta me?"

I had no words to answer, and she took my silence for refusal. She turned toward the next girl in line.

"Then," she said, "my sister. Maybe you lika her."

The estimate of my rejected suitor on housekeeping expenses was about fair, as I found out by investigating the problem. Clemente, our second cook, said that a native needed about ten dollars (Mexican) per month to live like a nabob, and that an American could have "mucha granda case" (a very fine establishment) for fifty. In going further with my investigations, I got my third proposal. I asked Recon's oldest wife how much it costs to marry. Instead of answering, she put a question of her own:

"You drinka much?"

"No."

"You play monte?"

"No."

Having received these assurances of my good habits, she left the hut abruptly and brought back another old hag and four young girls, ranging from twelve to sixteen. It was some time before I saw the point, but when Mrs. Recon lined them up before me and made a sweeping gesture down the line, I saw the point. They thought I wanted a partner for my joys and sorrows! The girls had evidently been let into the secret, for they looked at me with mild interest, although utterly unabashed. They had enough clothes between them to make one respectable ball-dress. All chewed betel except the eldest, who was smoking a large roll of tobacco. Mrs. Recon addressed me:

"Bueno. You matrimonia all four. You pay twenty pesos. I renta you house two pesos. Si! Little-a-one mucha cook. You give your dinero to the big one and she will mucha save. Si!"

I objected that no priest would marry me to four at once.

TAGALOG WOMEN BATHING.

"Ah, el padre he run away. "Papa" (referring to our versatile cook, her husband) "he matrimony you muy bueno." When I made further objection to polygamy, the prettiest daughter, the one who could cook, was offered for eight pesos and the homeliest was bid down to two.

My last offer of matrimony was the most unusual one of all. The thing which a Spaniard or a Filipino most admires in an American is his way of fighting. When one of them meets one of us he looks first at the American's fists. They can conceive standing up to be shot or even taking chances with a knife, but taking a beating and beating back is beyond their comprehension. A Spaniard goes into absolute ecstasies of admiration over a "scrap" between two regulars. He will dance on one foot and then on the other and shout like a Castilian at a bull-fight.

One day, I bought a dozen bananas of a street vendor for eight cents, which was about double the real value. Having no change, I gave him a five-dollar gold piece. He handed me back a dollar and ten cents in change, picked up his basket, and started away on the run. He understood the making of change as well as I did, but he also knew that if I were caught by the municipal police taking a gold piece away from a native, I stood a good chance at the jail. Nevertheless, I pursued and reasoned with him. He assumed a haughty air, and said that if I molested him further he would complain to the lieutenant. Just then the lieutenant came along, listened to the story, and believed my side of it. He delivered a Solomoncic judgment:

"Take back your gold-piece, give him back his change, keep the bananas and beat the nigger."

It is so rare that one has permission, out here, to do what he fain would do to one of these people that I made a good job of it.

A few days later that native turned up at my quarters. Behind him was a small native woman, gotten up in brass jewelry to show as good a front as possible, and passably clean. He opened transactions in a mixture of bad Spanish and Tagalog. I was a mucho grando hombre and strong. I could beat well with my fists. He had two neighbors who were troublesome and vexatious to his haughty spirit. Bueno. Here was his daughter, mucha young and domesticated. Beat his neighbors bueno, as I had beat him, and I might matrimony her, because I was a mucho grando hombre and strong.

And then you talk about knights of old fighting for the hands of fair ladies!

The United States surveying ship Nero, in taking soundings for the Pacific cable, found a sub-marine valley over six miles deep between Guam and the Midway Islands. This may mean that the proposed Pacific cable route will have to be abandoned, as the experts believe that this route "cannot be got around with a cable." The officers describe Sand Island, the largest of the Midways and the one proposed for use as a cable station, as a bleak spot, composed of disintegrated coral sand. There is not a scrap of vegetation, as there is no soil. There is, however, a five-acre coating of soil on an adjacent island, and it is proposed to transport it. The island is the resting-ground of millions of sea birds. Beginning with 1888, a shipwrecked sea-captain spent two years on this island, subsisting on birds, eggs, and on water which he found by digging. Four of his crew who were cast away with him died of hardship and scurvy caused by this fare and were buried on the island.

"Gen. Weyler walked nightly down the Prado," says Geo. W. Musgrave in Under Three Flags in Cuba, "with only an aide and three secret police sauntering behind. Some Cubans often debated with me the feasibility of seizing him there one night, dragging him down the steps to the Punta beach, and shipping him down the coast to Gomez, to be held as a hostage for all Cuban prisoners. This would have been easy in the darkness with a launch, and a tug in the offing that could race the obsolete boats in the harbor. We worked persistently in planning this. The guards were to be overpowered by sudden onslaught from the rear, the General seized, pinioned, and embarked. Lack of funds delayed the attempt. Finally, we chartered a tug in Key West, but the owner drew back at the last, and just as another boat was offered Weyler was recalled."

The Chicago and Bolivia Rubber Company, latly formed in this country, has bought 4700 square miles of rubber land on the upper Amazon. They propose to ship negroes from New Orleans to work their orchards, as the native labor is unsatisfactory.

THE MARK HOPKINS INSTITUTE OF ART· BY A·ALTSCHUL·

THE HOPKINS HOUSE.

DESIGN OF THE DONAHUE FOUNTAIN.

IN the most aristocratic section of San Francisco, on California and Mason streets, stands a large, dark grey house of imposing aspect, widely visible and forming one of the landmarks of the city. This is the Mark Hopkins Institute of Art, built as a residence for the famous citizen after whom it is named, and now the home of the San Francisco Art Association. This society, the chief center of the art life of the city since its foundation in 1872, was presented with the building by Mr. Edward F. Searles in 1893. Simultaneously the association, by agreement with the Regents of the University of California, became an affiliated college of the university, thus acquiring the rank of an officially recognized art academy. Its work consists chiefly in maintaining an art school, and in holding exhibitions. The regular spring exhibition at the institute is usually the principal event of the year in the artistic life of San Francisco, and gives the public a welcome opportunity to inform itself as to the achievement of local artists during the year. Besides, there are special exhibitions, usually restricted to the work of one particular artist—the Harrison exhibition in 1898 was a memorable event of this kind—and from time to time loan exhibitions are held, enabling the art lover to become acquainted with some of the art treasures usually kept in the seclusion of private residences. A more lengthy description of the work done by the association is not needed here, the subject of the following remarks being merely the building itself and the works of art which it contains.

The Hopkins house is a stately mansion in the late Gothic style of domestic architecture. It is built of wood, and this is frankly expressed in the architectural treatment of the façades, the chief motif being furnished by the constructional framework of vertical and horizontal beams, which project from the walls in the manner of pilasters and friezes. The most striking characteristic of the building is its studied irregularity. Each of the four façades differs from the others; each, considered by itself, avoids all symmetry. A number of variously shaped bow-windows, galleries, gables and turrets contribute to the diversified character of the whole. It is an original and striking composition, in correct style and good taste; but, while not without impressiveness of a somewhat somber kind, it lacks poetic charm, a quality to be found, for instance, in the adjoining Stanford residence, which in its detail is much more exposed to the strictures of fastidious critics than its neighbor. The front view of the institute, by the way, is not the best; the building appears to better advantage if the spectator stands in front of the Stanford house entrance, where the tower stands out very effectively, and the aspect of the whole is decidedly picturesque, putting one in mind of a feudal castle of the Middle Ages. The rear view from the corner of Powell and Pine streets is also fine. The view from Mason street, which used to be so, too, has been much impaired by the recent erection of a gallery annex. But, considering what a boon this structure will be to artists and art lovers, one need not grumble at the probably unavoidable sacrifice of picturesqueness. The exterior of the annex is somewhat too box-like, and, owing to its almost windowless walls, rather dreary; upon the whole, however, it is quite satisfactory.

Approaching the entrance of the institute, we find on the steps leading up to it a monumental piece of statuary, a bronze group consisting of two figures of more than life-size, by our distinguished fellow citizen, Mr. Douglas Tilden. It represents a football player having his wounded leg bandaged by a companion, on whose shoulder he leans. The work has the merits of truthfulness, simplicity, earnestness and virility; it is excellent as a composition, and the technique is very good. But, while it is a very respectable piece of work, and would make a very fitting ornament for an athletic practicing place, it may be doubted whether it quite satisfies the claims of beauty. The costume of the two youths, utterly plain without being in the least picturesque, would seem to have formed an almost insurmountable obstacle to success in this direction; besides, the heads are somewhat too realistic, although that of the wounded man is certainly very fine; and finally, a football is perhaps too rude and prosaic-looking an object to be fittingly introduced into a monumental work. The group is advantageously placed, the dusk of the entrance porch forming an effective background.

In its interior the building presents an impressive example of a palatial mansion, intended by its founder to be fashioned nobly, richly, and artistically in every part. It must be confessed that the result of this praiseworthy endeavor is by no means all that might be desired. Only one room is entirely satisfactory; all the others call for more or less severe criticism. Still, the general impression of grandeur, of largeness and splendor is not without artistic value; and to make up for the defects of decoration, there are—at least when the weather is fine—a series of glorious views of the bay and city, different in every room, and reminding one now of Florence, now of Genoa.

The most impressive part of the interior is the hall, a room of considerable size, two stories high and surrounded in the upper story by a gallery. The effect of stateliness is enhanced by the elaborate decoration, chiefly in carved wood. The forms of the decoration, however, while showing the designer's endeavor to be quite original, quite independent from any of the previous styles of ornamentation, are in decidedly poor taste. The paintings on the ceiling, representing great artists and poets, are as a whole not a success, although the separate figures are by no means badly painted. The best part of the decoration of this room is the series of eight large oil paintings covering the upper part of the walls, and showing representative buildings of different countries and times. The subjects represented are: an Egyptian temple, an Indian temple, Pompeii, Roman ruins, a Moresque palace, and the cathedrals of Venice, Milan, and (I think) Cologne. These pictures are works of considerable merit, especially the four last named. It should be added that one does not know the hall at its best unless he has seen it at one of the evening entertainments given on rare occasions by the Art Association. With a flood of brilliant light veiling rather than displaying its decorative imperfections, and with throngs of stylishly dressed men and women filling the floor and gallery, it presents a truly superb sight.

We now pass on to the dining room. This is the room referred to above as the only one in the house not subject to censure. It is very beautiful, and a perfectly consistent and harmonious piece of interior decoration. It is almost entirely finished in oak. The ceiling with its projecting beams is particularly fine. It is worth noting that the furniture and chandelier are in perfect keeping with the style of the room itself.

Not far from this room there is another, quite similar in dimensions and style of decoration, but much less satisfactory, in parts even gaudy and in poor taste. Of the other rooms some are attractive by spaciousness and pleasing proportions, but the decoration in all of them is cheap and tawdry.

Finally, the art works displayed in various rooms claim the visitor's attention. There are quite a number of paintings, and a few sculptural works. The great majority of them are of little or no value; and of the few good things some do not belong to the institute, but are only loaned to it for the time being. Among these is one of the chief ornaments of the building, a Japanese bronze of extraordinary size—it is almost fifteen feet high—and great merit, owned by Mrs. Hearst. It is a temple incense burner, consisting of a large urn on a high pedestal, both very richly adorned with figurative sculpture. A frieze of ten grotesque human faces, in high relief, surrounds the lower base; eight small lion-like monsters, standing in a circle on the lower base, uphold in their forefeet an upper one, which is otherwise suspended in air. On it stands the central figure of the whole, a large dragon of monstrous shape, magnificently conceived and realized, supporting on his back the incense urn; the handles of the latter are formed by two smaller dragons (each about five feet long) climbing up its sides; and on its top stands an eagle with a brood of young, all with wings outstretched and looking down upon the dragons, evidently in an attitude of defence. Besides all this, both urn and pedestal are almost completely covered with representations in relief and with minute pattern ornament. This highly elaborate composition is executed in a most excellent way and carefully finished in every detail; the amount of labor required must have been enormous. The technique is perfect and brings out the full beauty of the material. The style and taste of the whole are excellent. One of the most admirable features of the work is this, that the abundant detail is kept in perfect subjugation, so as not to obtrude itself and disturb the general effect. It must be confessed, however, that on the Occidental mind the work produces rather an impression of highly picturesque and decorative quaintness than one of pure beauty.

Of the paintings, but few deserve notice. First mention is due to one of the loaned works, a picture which no doubt escapes the notice of most visitors, so small and modest-looking is it. So is a nightingale small and modest-looking! This picture is a landscape by Corot, and may be found in the room adjoining the dining room, near the large window. It is a precious little work, a fine example of the master's power of conjuring up, by very slight means of realization, an exquisite poetic mood. The picture shows a valley traversed by a river, bounded by steep, densely wooded bluffs, crowned on one side by a large, palace-like building, partly in ruins. A torrent rushes down hill on the same side. It is early morning. The foliage is in the dull greyish-green characteristic of the master, the sky pale greyish-yellow. The picture is painted on board, in a very smooth manner. The handling seems tame and even somewhat heavy compared with the magic of the master's style at its best; no doubt the work belongs to an early period in his career.

The two finest paintings belonging to the Art Association are to be found in one of the front rooms on the second floor: William Keith's portrait of Mr. Irving Scott, and that of Mayor Phelan, by Fred Yates. These are works of real distinction, widely differing in technique, but similar in conception, both illustrating the wholesome tendency prevailing in modern portrait art to represent the sitter as simply and naturally as possible, without pose or self-consciousness of any kind. Mr. Keith is further represented by a large landscape (in the south west room on the second floor) showing a forest glade in deep dusk, with a portion of the sky lit up by a gorgeous green, red and gold sunset. The picture is very noble in conception, but its execution somehow lacks impressiveness.

On the landing of the stairway leading from the hall to the second floor hangs a large and rather pretentious-looking landscape, signed "Keelhoff, 1847." The subject is an Alpine scene with a thunderstorm approaching. A valley is shown, bounded in the background by a wall of gigantic mountains, with waterfalls issuing from their precipitous slopes. In the foreground, by the side of a river whose waters, lashed by the tempest, rush against its banks in whitecapped waves, stands a majestic group of tall firs, bent by the wind, one tree being already broken. On the right the rocky walls appear in a pale and lurid light; on the left, where the thunderstorm approaches, sky and earth are enveloped in darkness. The execution of the picture is poor, evidently founded on a very superficial and insufficient knowledge of nature. Yet one would not be justified in condemning the work as utterly worthless. In spite of its inadequate technique, the subject is sufficiently realized to appeal to the beholder's feeling and imagination; the effect of a natural drama full of power, majesty, passion and mystery is not unimpressively conveyed.

In the hall we find Becker's "Ave Maria," a domestic scene from sixteenth century Venice, rather agreeable, but lacking refinement of treatment; and Macchetti's "Henry IV. at Fontainebleau," a large, bright-colored picture, suf-

By BOSWELL Jr.

The False Plague Scare.

THE bubonic plague scare, absolutely unreasonable and unwarranted, promises to turn out the most expensive piece of political work ever done in San Francisco. It is proving a very bad business every way, and its effects are not liable to be forgotten for months to come. Simply because one Chinaman was found dead of a disease which has certain symptoms in common with bubonic plague, Chinatown was quarantined and the information telegraphed to the world that the dread ailment had broken out in the Californian metropolis. This summary action taken on a suspicion has quarantined San Francisco and turned thousands away from the city. The Raymond and Whitcomb excursionists, in Southern California by the hundreds, refuse to be turned north for fear of infection. The effort to participate in the Cape Nome business being made by a few of the more enterprising of Californian merchants is nullified by the same scare. In a hundred other ways it is operating to the disadvantage of San Francisco. If there had really been a case of bubonic plague there, if the action of the Board of Health had been justified by subsequent developments, one might find some excuse, but that the Californian metropolis should have been blackened and injured for no good reason whatever is shameful. In a city in which public opinion was a factor some measures would have been taken ere this to neutralize the effects of the Board of Health's rashness. As it is, the Examiner-Journal has spread the news broadcast, and while its announcement in either organ may discredit the scare among the intelligent, their circulation is in the ranks of the ignorant, who doubtless accept its aggravated and black-faced fictions as fact.

To emblazon the Board of Health's suspicion to the world was disloyalty to San Francisco. It would not have happened in Portland, in Seattle, in Victoria or in Los Angeles. There are no yellow traitors among the journals of those cities. In San Francisco the Publishers' Association met and its members all agreed to suppress the intelligence—until suspicions had been verified—all but the representative of the Examiner. He explained that the news had been telegraphed east and was already in the Journal. There is being developed a great deal of bitter feeling in San Francisco on this score, and if the Monarch's contemporaries have the wit to take advantage of it they may be able to seriously diminish their rival's circulation and advertising. It is the opinion of the well-informed, however, that this business community is too indolent and too timorous to resent the injury in the proper manner. This Board of Health should be scarified and the Examiner brought to an understanding of its bounden duty to a community from which it draws an income of at least $100,000 per annum.

A Simple Inauguration.

MAYOR THOMAS J. HUMES of Seattle, in succeeding himself as head of the town, had a characteristically simple inauguration. As the time approached when the old administration was to step out and the new step in, he was at his desk, busy writing. The clock struck twelve, the mayor glanced up, and, remarking that his new term had begun, opened the door to be overwhelmed with flowers and congratulations by his friends, waiting outside. The other officials walked into their new duties in the same businesslike manner. The city treasurer signed a receipt for nearly half a million dollars and went out to luncheon with his predecessor. It was a good omen for a business administration.

The Sources of the Dime Novel.

I SUPPOSE that nearly everyone who has watched the blazing covers of the dime-novels displayed in the windows of the cheap stores has wondered how the supply of that class of literature can be kept going, week after week and year after year. "Dime Novel" is a misnomer by-the-way, for most of them now sell for five cents or less. For the benefit of those whose youth was carefully guarded from sensational literature, let me say that dime novels run in series. A certain hero of preternatural strength, beauty, force of character, genius and "keenness" is taken through a succession of novels, a new one each week. Some of these series last four or five years. One man generally writes the whole series, turning out a complete story every seven days. When it is considered that these books depend mainly upon incident, and that incident is the severest tax on literary ingenuity, it would seem that the author has to possess the genius of one of his own heroes in order to keep the thing going. This would be, but for one fact which I believe will be new to the literary public. The modern dime novel is a system of plagiarism. The author selects a hero, gives him a high-sounding name, and then works over, week after week, some book of romantic fiction into dime-novel style. For example, there is a "Frank Merriwell" series now running in a popular "library" and devoured week after week by the messenger-boys. For about two years, the author kept him going as an adventurer in the West; then he suddenly sent him to school and college. Since then, Mr. Woods' clever story Harry's Career at Yale has furnished three or four numbers, Tom Brown's School Days has been good for a half-a-dozen, the various books of American short stories have each furnished their quota, and the author is now beginning on Stalky & Co. The detective stories proper used to be filched from the French masters, who have the art of making real literature out of this class of fiction. But when Conan Doyle began with Sherlock Holmes, a whole Klondike opened up for the miners of literary fool's-gold. These tales were worked over and rehashed in every possible combination, and are doing service even yet. Anna Katherine Green, our native writer of detective stories, has also received the tribute of this sincere form of flattery. If the reader cares to investigate, he can add to the list indefinitely. Among the books which I notice as recent recipients of the honor of dime-novel plagiarism are such unlikely specimens as Quo Vadis, The Honorable Peter Stirling and Richard Carvel.

Return of C. P. Huntington.

IN the eleven months which have elapsed since C. P. Huntington last said good bye to California, much has occurred to change his relationship with the great railway property of which he is president. Though at the head of the corporation, other voices were then heard in its management. Today his control is supreme. Two of the interests are now held by personal connections of Mr. Huntington, and the stock is owned by men who have absolute confidence in his great administrative capacity. In the year '99 this tremendously able man, whose years are more than three score and ten, re-organized the Central Pacific Railway, floated its debt to the government aggregating sixty millions of dollars, bought out two of his partners for a score more millions, and gave the property a rating on the New York stock market, in which it is regarded as one of the strongest railway institutions in the country. Even in this era of great deals these Titanic operations, executed single-handed, have made a tremendous impression upon the great financiers of the country. The manipulating of railway finances during the year of the panic, when of all the transcontinental roads the Southern Pacific alone was kept out of a receiver's hands, seemed a great achievement. The intelligent and steadily successful direction of the system during the years of his control represented his superb executive capacity; the creation of the greatest shipbuilding plant in the world at Newport News is a fitting life-work for even an extraordinary man; but all this and a hundred other deals and deeds have been but the incidents of a busy life in comparison with these latest colossal transactions. Withal, C. P. Huntington is one of the most easily approachable men in the country, with ample time to see his friends and to converse with any one who may happen to have business with him. To explain his career innumerable theories have been put forward, but the truth is that he possesses far more than the ordinary share of moral, physical and intellectual strength. He is unswerving in his loyalty and attachment to his friends, independent, bold and wise. He is one of the very few men who can broadly think out a scheme and then execute it himself, for he has the genius of foresight as well as of application. To apply a favorite expression of his own, he comes nearer to going round the circle than any of his contemporaries.

Time and Fame.

THE fame of most men dies long before their death. It is the fate of every active leader who lingers beyond the period of combat and struggle to undergo a period between retirement and death when he is, to all intents and purposes, forgotten—until the news of his demise brings the world to sudden remembrance. So it happens that a man who was known from one end of this country to the other a decade ago, who founded a national political party and persuaded it to merge its existence into another, died last week in Seattle without even the compliment of a newspaper notice. It was only several days after his death that the papers identified Herman E. Taubeneck as the founder of the Populist party. He has been living in the Queen City for three years, making it the headquarters for frequent prospecting expeditions. In all that time, not one of his neighbors learned of the man's former position. Taubeneck was an Illinois lawyer and politician when he became imbued with Populistic ideas and started the movement which culminated in 1890 in the foundation of a third party. He was the chairman of the first Populistic convention and held the gavel when James B. Weaver was nominated. He directed the ensuing campaign, and presided again at the famous convention which indorsed the candidacy of Bryan. It was said at the time that Taubeneck held the balance of power, and that his declaration for Bryan was the direct cause of his party's fusion with the Democrats. This action, however, finished Populism. With his party smashed, Taubeneck found his occupation gone and settled back into the obscurity of private life.

A Bold Theft.

A BANK robbery, that might elicit admiration from the experienced Jesse James, of bandit fame, was successfully perpetrated in Seattle last week. The coup was planned with an eye rather to safety than to defiance, for the robber displayed more of the accomplishments of the expert sneak thief than of the outlawed bank robber. In whatever manner he executed his trick, it secured for him what he was after, money; the bank claiming that the robbery netted the perpetrator only $700, while general belief adds several thousands of dollars to this sum. This is a trick of the public's, however. The robber, whom the police assert is a criminal just liberated from the Oregon penitentiary, must be credited with using the greatest ingenuity and daring in securing his gains. His work bears the earmarks of true greatness in his chosen profession. The First National Bank, located in the most crowded section of Seattle's business center, was honored by the visit from this genius among bank robbers. It is said he first walked into the counting house and proceeded to survey the field. Apparently satisfied, he quietly withdrew. This was about noon. Fifteen minutes later he again entered, this time on all fours. Carefully and cautiously he crept along, hugging the wall and keeping out of sight of the few clerks who were not out at luncheon. No depositors were in the bank at the time. Without attracting attention he slowly approached the paying teller's window. He reached the goal, made a sudden dart and a prize in currency was in his hands. He turned to flee. A clerk gave the alarm. The thief rushed for the door, pursued by clerks, bookkeepers, and even the president of the bank. As the robber raced through the vestibule, the valiant president reached him. Dropping a roll of currency, the fellow drew a revolver, which he flourished threateningly. The president picked up the roll, the robber held his fire and continued his flight. Through a crowded street he raced and was lost in an alley. A man has just been arrested in San Francisco on suspicion of being the bold offender.

First For Health.

EVERY good Western city takes a pride in superlatives. The town "beyon de Mississipp" that does not claim to be first in something or other is an invertebrate, lacking the energy to make a fight for existence. Seattle's last first is in health. A reliable table compiled by the Board of Health of a rival city concedes the Queen City the lowest death-rate of any in a list of twenty-five of the larger towns. In Seattle, with a population of 75,000, the death rate is only 6.72 per cent. Davenport, Iowa, is second on the list, while New Orleans, at the foot, has a rate four times as great. This is in face of the fact that the sanitary arrangements of other cities on the list are immensely better. The true explanation has just occurred to a sage of the Sound. He says that it is because the city is so spread out that death's arrows fall between the buildings.

Bellied Columns.

IT would be interesting to learn the source of Reid Brothers conception of the classic column. They have contributed to the architecture of San Francisco several important structures and others of their designing are rising on the hills and in the garden places thereof. In each and all of these there are columns, but instead of the noble classic lines they have an outward curve in the middle which produces a "pot-bellied" effect much more eccentric than graceful. The thirty-six columns of the Park music stand are all drawn on these lines; the frontal pillars supporting the portico of the Call building have a similar expanded effect and the same obtrusive convexity is displayed in the Irwin and John D. Spreckels' mansions now rising on Pacific Heights. The true proportion of the classic column prescribe that the lower part of the shaft shall be perfectly vertical. The entasis begins at about ⅓ the height and there should be a delicate tapering towards the capital. The Reid column is really an elongated oval and is not only wrong but ugly. What is true of the column is doubly true of the pilaster. The classic pilaster has no entasis, so "pot-bellied" effects introduced by the Reids are original but rude. One forgives innovation when characterized by beauty, but the alterations on standard models inaugurated by the San Francisco architects lack grace, style and art.

Automobiles on the Coast.

I HAVE been surprised at the slow spread of the automobile craze in San Francisco. The horseless carriage has become so common in the East that it is taken for granted and attracts no attention except in the remote country regions. But in San Francisco, the one or two automobiles seen on the streets are surrounded by curious crowds at every stop, so unaccustomed is the marvel. Yet no other city in the country is so well suited to the practical use of the car in all of its manifestations. In the Eastern states, an automobile is useless when there is snow on the ground, which means about three months in every year. Ordinary rain, on the other hand, causes little trouble, unless mudholes and sloughs form on bad roads. Consequently, a suburban resident of New York or Chicago or Boston who purchases an automobile for his daily run to the city finds it useless for nearly one-third of the year. In the San Francisco region, on the contrary, a skilled chaffeur could run from San Mateo to the metropolis almost every day of the three hundred and sixty-five. Until the machines are improved so as to become better hill-climbers, automobiles can never come into extensive use in San Francisco proper, but they should prove a boon to the suburban towns west of the bay. I prophesy that the craze will reach the Golden Gate the coming summer.

The fruit growers of Washington, Oregon and Idaho met at Portland recently and organized for mutual protection. Methods of curing and grading fruit for market were considered and some new plans were adopted. The fruit output of the three states, judging from reports already made by inspectors, will be enormous. Orchard pests have been entirely wiped out and every effort is being made to destroy them in orchards where they have secured a foothold.

Traveling in Alaska.

A PASS ON THE TRAIL FROM DAWSON TO NOME.

TWO travellers have just come over the ice and snow from Nome City in weather that was frequently colder than fifty below. They took no extra precautions against freezing, and they never stopped a single day on account of the weather. While it is true that they generally found houses to sleep in, one or two of the coldest nights were spent outdoors in the snow. Added to this low temperature was a high, vexatious wind, often in their very faces. Yet they came into Dawson in good condition, and seemed to be none the worse for the experience. A diary of the trip kept by Charles Campbell, one of the adventurers, is very instructive. On several days, they made over thirty miles. One day when the thermometer was eighteen degrees below zero and the wind was blowing a gale, driving the snow so that they could not see twenty yards ahead of them, they ran about twenty miles over frightfully bad trails. January 18, with the temperature sixty-five degrees below, they went twenty-two miles in five hours. On this trip, they took few extra precautions other than those generally observed by Alaskan winter travellers. Their dress was the one generally worn here in winter, no more nor less. They carried just enough provisions to feed themselves and their dogs on the long journey of nearly a thousand miles. They started with a stove and a tent, but gave the former away, and cut up the latter for sled covers. When habitations were convenient, they slept under cover, but on some of the very coldest nights they were obliged to camp out-of-doors, bivouacking in their sleeping-bags beside open fires. The example so encouraged the unemployed of Dawson City, who have been waiting for the first sign of an open trail to make a dash for Cape Nome and open mining, that nearly a hundred outfits of men and dogs are already started down the back trail.

The apparent ease with which this journey was accomplished has set us to thinking, here in Dawson, on a subject which furnishes the topic for many a debate by our Arctic firesides—Polar exploration. Papers coming in from the states have been announcing the fact that the Northern gold finds will assist Polar exploration as a great and wonderful discovery of their own. We have felt that from the very first. We knew it when the Nome country, containing the most northerly Caucasian city in the whole world, was opened up for American miners. In the mines of Alaska to day we are training Polar explorers. From the present gold-diggers of Dawson or from their immediate successors will come the men who will set first foot on the frozen pole. Already, in the two or three seasons in which we have overrun Northern Alaska, we have learned much about Arctic travelling which the explorers never knew and performed some feats which are nowhere equalled in the annals of Polar exploration. The two travelers covered three times the distance from "farthest North" to the Pole in less than two months, from December 10th to February 2d. Considering that the dash to the Pole must be made in summer, it is doubtful if conditions of travel will be as hard as those encountered on the Nome-Dawson winter trip. Indeed, old and experienced Alaskans are a bit disposed to scoff at Arctic explorers and their tales. It is pointed out that there are no witnesses to the deeds of an Arctic traveler. If he wants to push into the interior in a slip-shod, undetermined manner, to stop at the first discouragment and to invent tales of imaginary hardship and suffering to tell in his lectures when he comes back, there is no one to "give him away."

Already, we have found much to laugh at the books of Arctic travel which used to charm our youth—many fallacies, many Munchausen statements. For example, there is an idea, which I acquired from some of these fairy tales and carried with me to the north, that it sometimes grows so cold that fire gives no heat. Sixty below was the point stated, I believe. I myself have weathered seventy below and found a fire mightily comforting and acceptable ta that temperature. There is an intense cold, I admit, in which it takes a big fire to raise the temperature a great deal, bur there is never a time when a tight hut cannot be warmed by a big fire. Another thing we have learned is that seemingly any degree of pure, straight cold can be met by a hearty, healthy and vigorous man. Beyond fifty degrees below, there is no apparent addition of discomfort with the added cold. If you keep going, wear the best you have, and take care not to become starved or exhausted, you need not fear the weather. The men who die of freezing on the trails are killed by exhaustion or hunger as much as by cold. A man is lost on the snowfields; he wanders until he is hungry and worn out, and only then, with his powers of resistance gone, does he give up to the fatal numbness. I have yet to hear of a strong man who took care of himself meeting with any harm through exposure to Arctic chill.

Shall I hazard a prophecy as to the future of Arctic exploration? In my unworthy opinion, the successful dash to the Pole will come after the Americans have occupied Nome and the northern country long enough to be accustomed and acclimated—say ten years. By the end of that time, the uttermost limits of the Arctic lands on our own continent will have been overrun by explorers. It will be no scientific zeal which will urge them to this, but the same sordid desire for gold which first brought the Americans to Alaska. In the course of these explorations, our prospectors will learn how to live and travel in the frozen zone. In the course of these explorations, some mightily long and arduous journeys will be undertaken and some big mistakes made. In these very mistakes will lie the value of these explorations. The Pole-searchers have conducted heavy and costly experiments, mostly theoretical, and so few and scattered have the expeditions been that later voyagers have learned very little from their predecessors. But these American explorers of the future will learn the trade of Arctic traveling, they will become acclimated, the weak ones will have dropped out, and the survivors will be tested men who can stand anything within the limits of human endurance. And some leader among them will gather from the Alaskan miners the successful Polar expedition of, let us say, 1910.

J. V. STETSON.

In Belgium a municipal art society has taken hold of the matter of signs and initiated competitions. They give liberal prizes for the best designs. Sculptors and skillful workers in iron compete because of the value of prizes and because of their interest in the work, and the merchants because of the advertisement which it gives them. The result has been that all over Brussels you find pretty signs, and the curious part is that the beautiful ones pay better than the ugly; for while the latter only receive a passing notice and then a feeling of disgust, the signs which are beautiful attract permanent attention.

It may not be generally understood, but the Victoria Cross, the coveted decoration in the British army which may be given to private or officer alike, is not given for mere acts of bravery but for the rescue of comrades in danger. After first winning the cross, he who earns it again simply adds another bar to the medal. The original cross carries a pension of £10, and for each additional bar £5 is added.

THE TRANSVAAL MACHIAVELLI.

CAREER OF DR. FRANZ LEYDS, MANIPULATOR AND STATESMAN.

WHEN Dr. Leyds, the Transvaal agent, came to Europe, a few years ago, he was in the position of a suppliant. He waited long hours at the doors of ministers and dignitaries, he paid large sums to the newspapers for the acceptance of his contributions, he was continually concerned with backstairs intrigues to secure a hearing for himself and his schemes. To-day, he has only to ask and every door opens to him. Let him express a desire to see this or that prime minister and he is accomodated at once. If he stops at a hotel, the proprietor hangs out the flag of the Transvaal. There is not a publication on the Continent which would not give fancy prices for one of his articles. And from the most obscure legation in Brussels, the Transvaal headquarters is second in importance only to the Palace.

Much of this has come about, of course, through force of circumstances—the growth of the Transvaal in importance, the rise of anti-British feeling and pro-Boer sympathy—but, on the other hand, a great part of the intense feeling on the Continent has been worked up, in one way and another, by this shrewd, shify, mysterious disciple of Machiavelli. Until this age is past and the historian of the future learns the truth about the nineteenth century from documents now carefully guarded, no one will ever know just how much Leyds has had to do with influencing Europe at this crisis. Even then, the record will be incomplete. The full facts are known to Dr. Franz Leyds alone, and he has no confidants.

He is as reticent about his own history as about his official business. The general facts are known, however. He is the son of a Java Dutchman, and his mother had a strain of Malay blood. This does not appear in his face, but shows in his long, slender, slippery hands and in his sly and diplomatic character. He emigrated early to Transvaal, but went to Holland to study law. There he remained in an insignificant position until Kruger, who was in Holland after Dutchmen to officer his kingdom, carried him back to South Africa. Johannesburg was then just beginning its growth and the Boers were learning what it means to conduct a government. Of all the "carpet-baggers" the young law-student advanced most rapidly. So strong was his influence that he set his stamp upon the character of the administration and the policy of the republic. There is little doubt but that the duplicity, or "slimness," as they call it, of the Kruger regime dates from Leyds. It was the first Boer lesson in government, and they only elaborated on their primary training. Had a broad, honest statesman taken control at that time the Transvaal might have advanced toward progress on its own initiative and without the compulsion of this disastrous war; but Leyds was the power behind the throne, and the new policy took on his own character. As attorney general and secretary of state, he used his powers of persuasion and cajolery to mould Kruger to his wishes, obstinate old man though Oom Paul be. It was Leyds who made of the rather insignificant Jameson raid an event of seeming international importance. It was Leyds who organized the great far-reaching Transvaal secret service. It was Leyds who founded that system of corruption and bribery by which the Transvaal Boers were enabled to arm and prepare for the present war without the knowledge of England.

Leyes knew, however, that a part of his game must be played in Europe, if the Transvaal was to become dominant in South Africa. From Pretoria, he administered the international affairs of the republic, but to win Europe he needed to be on the ground. This was one reason for his shift to the center of operations, but there was another, far more potent. He had reached the limit of his advancement in Transvaal itself. He was never popular with the burghers. For Leyds had European tastes and European ways little understood by the rude Boers. Long before his name became a great one in the world, travellers in the country across the Vaal used to tell as one of their wonder-tales, about the chief secretary who could discuss Dante and Turner. It is said that he even liked a little gossip from London and Paris—though it came to him four weeks old. The chances of such a man for the chief position in the burgher state were nil. Therefore, he turned his eyes on Europe, where there were worlds to conquer.

He proposed that he be sent as an emissary and that he be given $25,000 per annum for his personal services together with $75 000 to be used in the advancement of his intrigues. Kruger refused, laughed at the proposition. Then Leyds informed him that his salary must be $50,000 and that a secret fund of $100,000 should be given him. Oom Paul, alarmed by the obvious determination of his subordinate, sent for him. They talked long into the night. At the end, the president had consented and Leyds went forth to cope with Europe, to do obeisance before kings and princes, and to wait and labor for five years to obtain recognition for himself and his government. He kept his agents in every quarter of Europe. He knew, better than any journalist on the continent, just what was going on in the courts and cabinets of the world. He knew to a dot the price of every editor in the world. He knew the best military methods, the most improved form of armament. He had all the money he needed, for the Transvaal is a rich country, and he is a champion extortionist. No scruple ever held his hand; no rebuff ever discouraged him. With the finest feeling for the diplomatic game, he combines a hide like that of a rhinoceros for insults and an elastic and accommodating conscience. In his working moments he unites the faculties of a chief of detectives and a prime minister. In his leisure time, he dabbles in art, literature, and the drama, or mixes in society. He has attained the first and second great objects of his life—to secure power in Transvaal, to gain recognition in Europe—the third, the recognition of his government abroad, still hangs fire.

INSTITUTE OF ART.

ficiently pleasing to the eye, but uninteresting. One of the south rooms on the first floor contains an attractive but not first-class example of Pasini's delicate studies of Southern architecture. In the same room with the Corot is a tolerably pretty Spanish painting, "Church Procession," by Jose Gallegos; also two pictures of sheep, by Mauve and Jacques. Another animal painting, by Dupré, representing cows in a meadow, is to be found in one of the south rooms on the second floor; it is an unusually large canvas, and a very strong piece of painting, but not particularly interesting.

Lastly, we come to the collection of photographs of paintings, in the north east room on the second floor. The idea of exhibiting reproductions is no doubt most sensible; indeed, a very extensive use ought to be made of such objects in museums, as they might to a much greater extent, than most people would imagine, make up for the absence or paucity of desirable originals. Of course, in order to accomplish this, a collection of this kind must be selected, arranged, and displayed with the greatest care and discrimination; otherwise the pictures will hardly be productive of much good. The collection at the Hopkins Institute, it seems to me, is of the latter kind. It contains quite a number of very good and serviceable pictures; but joined to them are a greater number of more or less undesirable ones, seriously impairing the value of the whole. On the walls are a number of Braun's photographs. A good many of them reproduce great masterpieces, but for one reason or another the reproductions do not sufficiently convey the effect of the originals, being in fact rather unattractive (except that of Turner's "Téméraire"). Others are unsatisfactory because the originals reproduced are by no means of the first rank and do not deserve a place in a collection such as this, which should contain nothing but examples of the very best which art has produced. To find such a picture as Delaroche's "The Princes in the Tower" side by side with masterpieces by Raphael, Michel Angelo and Velazquez, is nothing short of ludicrous. Another and much better set of photographs is displayed on a revolving screen (not a very commendable way of exhibiting pictures). Here one finds a number of first-class masterpieces reproduced in a thoroughly satisfactory manner (excepting only the pronounced brown tone in which they are printed, a tone much favored by photographers, but very detrimental to the effect of photographs of paintings). But the admixture of distinctly, even ludicrously inferior works is found here also, although to a lesser extent. What possible good can be expected, for instance, from the introduction of such a hopelessly stiff and wooden production as Ingres' "Jeanne d'Arc," or such an undignified and uninspired one as Baudry's "St. Hubert"? Three more screens contain a great number of the large photogravures of the Berlin Photographic Company, after paintings in the galleries of Berlin, Cassel and St. Petersburg; the prints are fine, but the pictures reproduced only in part thoroughly enjoyable.

We leave the building, if not with the consciousness of having had a very extraordinary æsthetic treat, certainly with feelings of respect and gratitude for the public-spirited men aud women to whose liberality and zeal the institution owes its existence.

The Bar Association of Seattle has inaugurated a movement to erect a monument to the memory of the Washington volunteers who fell in the Philippines. Captain George Fortson, one of the killed, was a member of the Bar Association, and it was while talking over his death that the matter was taken up. The monument is to be erected in Pioneer Square where the famous totem pole now stands. At least $25,000 will be expended for the shaft and inscribed upon it will be the names of all the brave men of the regiment who died while fighting for their country. All patriotic people will be asked to contribute to the fund, of which the Bar Association will have custody.

No one who has not seen a kopje, says a South African, can easily realize it. It is not a hill so much as the stump of a hill—what is left of it after ages of denudation; but the special feature of it is that it is almost invariably covered with a breastwork of bowlders. Tropical torrents have washed away the earth and all the soluble components of the rock, and what is left consists of heaps and lines of detached masses of sandstone, ironstone or granite. The kopjes are the Boer's fortifications, and he has any number of them.

A new invention which will have a great influence on all arts and industries where steel is employed is a process of coating steel plates with fine layers of copper in such a manner that the two are firmly welded. The resulting product has all the spring, snap and temper of steel and is at the same time impervious to rust. The two metals are rolled at the same time, and in the finished plate, no matter whether it is thick or thin, the copper is united with the steel so firmly that it cannot be broken or stripped off.

The word "grip" as a name for the common winter malady, was originated in the last century by a French physician. The name "influenza" was given in 1802, when it was devastating Italy. In spite of a number of epidemics during this century, the fact that it is caused by a germ was never proved until 1892, when Prof. Pfeiffer of Berlin discovered the microbe. It is shaped like an egg, travels by contagion, multiplies with great rapidity, and secretes a poison which causes the disease. Grip travels from place to place like cholera or plague. Last year, a heavy epidemic passed through Turkey and over the Mediterranean countries.

BLANCHE BATES IN MADAME BUTTERFLY.

THE SHAMROCK IN LONDON.

EXTRAORDINARY CELEBRATION OF ST. PATRICK'S DAY.

AN Irish flag floating over the Mansion House, an official British army band playing "Wearing of the Green," and a brigade of English soldiers wearing the shamrock and parading in honor of the occasion—a strange scene for London on St. Patrick's day. Lord love us, how times change! This is London, conspired and stormed at by the Fenians, London which rioted over the Phoenix Park murders, London where, fifty years ago, one who wore the green would have met the same fate as one who would hang out the Transvaal flag to-day. A few Irish regiments and a national emergency have done what was too much for Gladstonian statesmanship; they have made the Irish popular in England. It does not bridge all streams between Ireland and Ireland's masters, but it sets the piers.

As T. P. O'Conner says to-day, there was a time when the Irish soldier who wore shamrock would have been clapped into the guardhouse. British soldiers of all races wore it to-day. The buildings and mansions of the city were draped as for Lord Mayor's day, but with green instead of red. Everyone who could afford it bought a shamrock, but it took a bit of money, owing to the demand. Sprigs of the little green leaf had been sent over in great quantities for the occasion, but the demand was greater than even the most loyal Irishman expected. On the morning of St. Patrick's day, the price was a half-a-crown for a bunch of two or three leaves, and this doubled before nightfall. The new Irish loyalist flag floated from the Mansion House. It is the old familiar golden harp on a green ground, but a Union Jack is added in the upper corner and the harp is crowned. The day was observed as a fete rather than as a day of business on the Stock Exchange. Everybody laid off to drink to the nation and the Irish, and stocks caught the buoyant spirit of the occasion and went up and up, for no accountable reason except that they were happy with everyone else. Ireland was cheered on the streets, toasted at the clubs, prayed for in the churches. And yet, I hear that the Irish on your side of the pond have turned their St. Patrick's day celebration into a pro-Boer demonstration.

If the Queen conceived the idea of displaying the shamrock on St. Patrick's day, as they say she did, she is a wiser stateswoman than anyone has ever given her credit for being. Like the acceptance of the colonial regiments, it is good "imperial cement."

But the world knows of the St. Patrick's day celebration in London, through the telegraph, while the world as represented by the Pacific Coast possibly may not know the story of what came near to being the one touch of comedy in the Transvaal tragedy. The Duc d' Orleans, pretender of France, is the central figure in this episode. This last of the Bourbons, unworthy descendants of white-plumed Henry of Navarre, is an underbred, effeminate degenerate. "'Tis the blood of kings," said the mother to the physician of Daudet's novel in explaining the wasted physique of the little Dauphin. And Orleans's is the degenerate blood of kings. Fat, effeminate, lazy, cowardly, and a general cad, he is at the same time permeated with a self-conceit which adds the finishing touch to his ridiculous figure. It so happens that he bears a sort of resemblance to Henry of Navarre, a resemblance of which he makes the most by cultivating a Bourbon beard; but he has Navarre's vices without his manly virtues. The manner in which he treated his former fiancee, Marguerite d' Orleans, was such as to bring upon him the contempt of two-thirds of the French aristocracy. Most of the remainder he alienated by ingratitude, or by "welshing" on his gambling debts. And this lost popularity he has been trying to recover by persistent and wild Anglophobia. In line with this policy, he recently wrote to M. de Willette, the caricaturist of the famous Rire supplement, thanking him for "his services to the cause of humanity." It was a crude effort, marked by bad French and vile language, but as an insult it served. The indignation on this side of the channel, where D'Orleans has always been well treated, was universal. In the midst of the storm, he packed up and departed, very suddenly, for Lisbon.

The reason for his departure was the discovery of a plot against his royal dignity. A certain young English marquis, not long from Oxford and cricket training, had planned with his brother and a young officer of the Sutherland Highlanders to treat the Pretender as befitted his offence. They were going to catch him as he emerged from the Carlton Hotel, break a bag of flour over his head, and cover that with a coating of soot. This operation, known in England as "the miller," was to be completed by taking a snapshot photograph of the Duc in his plight. This picture was to be sent to the papers for publication. This was the plan formed after mature deliberation. At first, the Marquis was inclined to think that he or some other Englishman of about the Duc's size ought to go in and beat him soundly; but this idea was abandoned because it was deemed that this party to the slander of a woman did not deserve the favor of a fair fight. The Duc got wind of the plot the night before the time set for its consummation and made his escape by a back way, sailing immediately and secretly for Lisbon. The Marquis announces that the assault is not abandoned, but only postponed until Orleans shows himself in London again.

THE SPRING EXHIBITION.

INAUGURATION OF THE NEW ART GALLERY IN THE HOPKINS HOUSE.

THE Spring Exhibition of the San Francisco Art Association, held at the Mark Hopkins Institute of Art, this time actually marks a distinct and meritorious progress in every respect. The opening was of particular importance, as it meant the official dedication of the "Mary Frances Searles Art Gallery," donated by Mr. Searles. This annex is a large hall excellently fit for showing pictures, the light being fairly good in day-time (double skylight) and absolutely perfect at night (electric light with reflector). The dignity of the room is unfortunately impaired by a commonplace and meaningless frieze; a simple band of light color would have been more effective and appropriate. To make the exhibition more complete, for the first time in years, pictures exhibited previously were admitted. Thanks to the energy of the jury, really amateurish paintings are much less in evidence than at former exhibit, but I think we might have been spared a number of canvasses, so that the pictures could have been hung further apart, giving more importance to the single canvass and to the eye a necessary rest.

The place of honor is occupied by some big landscapes of William Keith, in which he asserts his superlative craftsmanship in a most brilliant way, especially in the "Summit of the Sierras" and the "Sunset Among the Oaks." Such effects are only obtainable by a rare sensitiveness of appreciation of colors and tones, and a sureness of touch, which only the true master possesses. A neighbor to Keith is Mrs. Richardson with her vigorously handled portrait of Professor Howison, full of a sterling exactness of color. Portraits, by the way, are rather numerous at the exhibit, in fact about two thirds of all the pictures being portraits and landscapes. Orrin Peck's study of his sister, in its beautiful gold brown tones, its simple and effective arrangement of lines is a good thing to admire; its perfectness rather injures Peck's portrait of Mrs. Hearst, the color scheme of which strikes one as a little crude. Julia Heyneman's portraits, though not always correctly drawn, are at least thoroughly human and interesting, particularly the boy with the book; the light falling upon the face is exceedingly well managed there. Her portrait of Mrs. Walter Hobart is done in beautiful mellow tones; more like Mrs. Richardson paints Olga M. Ackerman. She has a very frank and almost audacious method that is refreshing and convincing, qualities all sadly lacking in Theodore Wores, who ought not to paint portraits. He has done some very good Japanese things, and his fishing boy at the Bohemian Club is really excellent, but the paintings he exhibits now, except a rather good pastel, "Reflections," are of a very inferior character. In the portraits of Mr. J. D. Grant and Mr. Horace Platt he has spoiled two fine heads by his crude handling. Of the dignity of portrait painting, and even of its merely mechanical side, he knows only as much as Clawson, whose over-admired portrait of Miss Hadenfeldt seems to me utterly lacking in that refinement of pose and treatment, which, perhaps, would not appeal to the fancies of the indiscriminating public. Quite a notable work is A. Altman's study of an old woman, wrought out with a pertinacity of finish that does not become narrow, a danger equally well avoided by H. F. Beecher, who, especially in two heads, shows besides good drawing and vivacious coloring an enjoyable breadth of treatment in spite of all minuteness. Arthur F. Mathews surprises us by a complete change of his methods, noticeable since his return from Europe. The extreme simplicity of his coloring, reminds one of Whistler, and is certainly very effective. I would have liked to study his "Psyche" better than is possible under the glass. Emil M. Carlsen's "Still Life" is a piece of remarkable technical excellence, but does not equal, as a picture, his large landscape, one of the most enjoyable things in the collection. Only the real artist can develop so simple a motive with such strength and feeling that it becomes fascinating and beautiful. Something of a sensation was caused by Jules Pages' "Corner of a Studio." It shows a sureness of drawing and coloring, which place the work on a very high level; as a picture I think it would have been more effective, if the details in the studio paraphernalia had been more subdued, but the figure of the painter before his easel is a work of rare merit.

Of other things in the main room, Charles Dickman's "Evening" ought to be mentioned, a delicately conceived problem, ably executed: the subtle greys and grey-blues of the ending day absorbing the shadows cast by the rising moon. Stanton, "Fancy Head," is quite the best thing this artist has ever done. C. C. Judson has in his two landscapes, gotten rid of the tendency to accentuate detail, and Joe Greenbaum has given up experimenting and settled down to solid work. The atmospheric effect in his skillfully handled "Grey Day in Monterey" is excellent, while his "Pumpkin Field" is the only one of the various vegetable fields on exhibition that pictorially has any value. Maren Froelic, can do much better things than fetching little ballet-girls. Helen Hyde, who recently sent from Japan some charming etchings, is much better in her "Fishing Boy" and "Solicitude," than in her Chinese studies. D. Cosgrave's little moonlight a la Peters is a rather creditable piece of work; while J. M Raphael's "Blacksmith Shop" is more an interesting and ambitious experiment, than a success.

Of the water colors, pastels and drawings, which are distributed in the other rooms, not much can be said here. There are only a few things of real value, L. M. Dixon's work showing the strongest individuality. O. Kunath has quite a number of miniatures, the best of which seems to me the head of an old lady, excellently drawn and loosely painted. M. Edgerly has in the reclining head "The Sisters" painted a thing of such excellence, showing such a fine treatment of the little, that it will be difficult to bring her future work up to the standard she has created for herself thereby.

The main hall is given over to the statuary and such a display of sculpture by local artists is something hitherto unknown in San Francisco. Douglas Tilden occupies the most important place with two models of the Donahue Fountain. He has materially improved the original conception during the two years he has been working at it. It is without doubt a great and powerfully conceived composition, very correctly rendered. But it leaves one cold. The figures or the working men have too much of the carefully studied studio poses, their arms and bodies do not pull with all their might, the tension of their muscles is not convincing. But in spite of this, and even if the whole thing may not be appropriate for a memorial fountain, it is a work that will be an ornament to the city, for which we ought to be thankful. Tilden's tombstone can in no way compare with Aitken's "Mystery of Death" for the Crocker Mausoleum in which Aitken shows that he has both ideas and the ability to execute them in a masterly way. His much talked of "Life's Flowing Bowl" is nothing but a sketch, put together in a few days to give expression to his idea. And it certainly is an absolutely original, brilliant and truly beautiful conception for a fountain, It would be unjust to criticise the technical faults of the sketch. It is sincerely to be hoped that the group, in spite of the narrow-minded and rather superfluous discussion it has evoked, will adorn one of the public squares of San Francisco, to which it has generously been offered by Mr. R. Weil. Aitken has quite a number of his works there, all showing more or less his great originality and remarkable ability. Of the other pieces Edgar Walter's bust of his beautiful mother and little sister may be mentioned, also the animal studies of Putnam, and old Le Jeune's "Crying Boy."

The illustrated catalogue, though not quite a success as far as the reproductions of the pictures goes, is a laudable effort, for which thanks are due to the curator of the Institute, R. H. Fletcher.

ARNOLD GENTHE.

Her One Thought.

SPOKE about some well-known books;
I asked her if she read.
She charmed me with her woman's looks,
But "no" was what she said.

Quite lightly then I touched on art,
But naught she had to say.
E'en as I spoke, I saw her heart
And eyes were far away.

I spoke of love in such a tone
As might have made her blush.
Yet to her cheeks' full rounded zone
The color did not rush.

She simply muttered, as I ground
My feet into the floor:
"It seems too good! I've gone around
At last in ninety-four!"

RISKS

Are run by every woman who has household cares. It is so easy just to run out of the warm house into the fresh air, to pin a piece of lace to the clothes line. It is also easy to take cold in doing so. Then perhaps comes suppression and kindred evils. Whenever there is any disturbance of the normal womanly function Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription may be relied upon to re-establish perfect health. It is strictly a temperance medicine, containing no alcohol or whisky, neither opium, cocaine nor other narcotic.

"Several years ago I suffered severely from female weakness, prolapsus and menorrhagia, and used 'Favorite Prescription' with splendid effect," writes Fannie Shelton, of Washington, Iowa. "Glad I have not needed it for a few years past but if I should have a return of the old trouble would surely try 'Favorite Prescription.' I have recommended it to a number of my lady friends. I always tell them to try a bottle and if they are not benefited by it I will pay for the medicine. In every case they have spoken in praise of it."

Sick women are invited to consult Dr. Pierce by letter free. All correspondence strictly private and sacredly confidential. Address Dr. R. V. Pierce, Buffalo, N. Y.

Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription makes weak women strong and sick women well.

BABBLINGS OF A BELLE

I REALLY believe, my dear Diary, this is the most pleasant part of the year. Why I could ever have dreaded Lent is a mystery. It is infinitely more fun just to go where one wishes, and to see those whom one likes, than to be on the continual qui vive, as I have been all the winter. Of course, mama says I like my pleasant life because I think I am in love, and my men friends have been good enough not to drop me. There is no doubt about it, I had real platonic friends. The men who used to come to see me would by now have dropped out of my life had such not been the case. Fortunate, I suppose, I should call myself, but I do not; I think I am called upon because I can perhaps give the men I know a jollier hour than most of the other girls. There is one fellow who will shortly announce his engagement to a dark, stunning-looking girl, yet he never lets a week pass without dropping in to see me. I sing him the songs that appeal to his soul. It's a comic, serio-sentimental coon soul, I have discovered from his choice in songs. Then I tell him all the stories I get out of the funny papers, with an Irish accent, and he tells me some of the things other girls tell him about the girls I do not like, so we are great friends. The girl to whom he is engaged knows of his friendship for me, and though we are not particularly congenial she does not mind. My "Ideal" at first hated me to have different crushes come in, but Arthur assured him that they were all real platonics. Now I can have just as many as I like, so long as I do not evince any desire to go out with them. The "Ideal" does not wish to build yet. I am a bit disappointed, for I intended having the most artistic house in town, and if there had been pillars they would not have been swollen in the middle. The real Ionic would have suited my taste. I can't see that the San Francisco Improvement on Greek Architecture Company is as successful as it had at first anticipated. I think the columns on the Irwin and Spreckels house a deformity. We have our lot, however, and will build when we have quite made up our mind what style of house is liable to suit the two of us. My tastes are twentieth century, and the "Ideal," though a fine fellow, and yet to be my husband, has queer ideas on the sort of house in which one should live. Of course, I hope to have him inoculated with my artistic spirit, and then I shall do as I please. I do not know how we shall manage this summer, for the house that I anticipated taking has been rented to the Raoul-Duval's for three months. San Mateo is the only place in which one can have a good time, though I hear that San Rafael is to be pretty popular again this year. I should like to build a large bungalow in Burlingame, and may do so yet, for the "Ideal" likes sports of all kinds, and then it is not too far from San Francisco. In the meantime, I am being deliciously entertained by all the people who know me and getting as much pleasure into each day as though Lent were specially arranged for that purpose.

Tuesday was the final Damrosch concert. It quite met with my approval, and I do think we were sufficiently enthusiastic to make Bispham, Gadski and their soulful conductor return again to our midst. Now we have Paderewski with us. It rather disappoints me to think he is married again. My "Ideal" likes celebrities, so he called on the Paderewskis and I had the pleasure of meeting them at dinner. Ignace was very good company; he is clever as a narrator and cheerful. I found him most congenial. Madame Paderewski is different. I do not think she really particularly cares for the American girl. She seemed surprised at my leading and holding the conversation. However, I forgive her for her huband's sake. We had a fine time at the concert on Monday night. The "Ideal" invited ten besides ourselves and I enjoyed so much seeing how the strains of the piano affected each one. I prefer afternoon concerts, so I can either go alone or pick out someone who will appreciate the silence I like to maintain after something very fine has been rendered. But my "Ideal" wishes to clap and then discuss something apropos of anything but music. I am engaged to him now, so he gets his own way. However, I realize daily I am not mama's daughter for nothing. I, like Whitelaw Reid, believe thoroughly in expansion.

Thursday last Therese Morgan had a number of us to tea to meet Helen Thomas. We all had a capital time. I wish I had a little of Helen's enthusiasm. I cannot talk of the "Ideal" with the fervor she does of Mr. Kimble, but of course he is a much younger man than my "Ideal," and Helen is a more enthusiastic girl. She is to be married on the twenty-fifth of April and will have Charlotte Field, Hattie Kimble, Ruth McNutt, Therese Morgan, Adelaide Murphy and Edith Preston as bridesmaids. I think, as the "Ideal" said, that Helen has picked out the handsomest girls in town for bridesmaids. Molly Thomas will be maid of honor. Robert Kimble is to be best man. If my heart were not being true to the "Ideal", I believe Rob Kimble might have it to play with for awhile; even as it is he is an awfully nice chap. It will be a very pretty wedding, and just five days before mine. Helen and I have a sort of fellow-feeling these days. I like to see her quite frequently and talk over the feeling we had before we were really in love.

The Downey Harvey hunt breakfast Saturday morning was a wonderful success. It was awfully well cooked. Diary dear, a well-cooked meal means more to me almost than the love of my "Ideal." Were I a man I should, I fear, marry a cook. Being a woman, I am marrying a man who can afford the luxury of the best cook in town. A great many girls rode—Mary Scott, Mary Crocker, Marie Wells, Addie Murphy, Miss Metcalf, a girl I really like, and the Brittans and Whitneys. We had a good deal of pretty rough riding across the country, and for miles at a time I really had most disagreeable sensations. There were stones and poor ground to contend against, but I think I was as fortunate as the other girls, though I had one disagreeable spill which I have not mentioned either to mama nor to my "Ideal." Mr. Downey Harvey made an excellent presentation speech upon giving Frank Carolan the silver loving cup. It is a beauty. Something about a loving cup always appeals to me.

I forgot to tell you that I had a fine evening at the Hopkins Art Institute on Thursday. Some of the pictures are excellent; those I particularly liked I intend going to see again, alone. It is so difficult to thoroughly appreciate pictures when one is with a jolly crowd; and we were a merry lot, as we had had a big dinner down at the Bohemian Club before we went. I liked one of Keith's particularly. I wish someone would give it to me for a wedding present. It is a view of the Sierras. If I can I shall get Carlsen's "Still Life." I really think it is the best work in the gallery. Lots of the others were interesting, but it is those especially I should like for wedding presents. I think our young artists can be congratulated on their work. Mama has promised me Evelyn McCormack's "Monterey Custom House." I think it charming, and it is one of the most picturesque remnants of old California—the dear old days of which we have so poetic an idea and which with the decay of the adobe houses are gradually fading from our hearts and minds. I always hoped to have something more than an enlarged photograph of that building.

Aitken's door of the Crocker tomb is one of the finest things in the exhibition, to my idea. I do hope that he may live long enough to do some work for me when I have money in the bank.

In the meantime, Diary dear, be cheerful, and I hope I shall be more entertaining next week.

Indeed, he has done more to advertise the Islands than anyone else. It is unnecessary to speak of the excellent qualities of Frank Davey's work. He was esteemed one of the best camera men in the United States and certainly he has lost none of his skill since. During the plague he made over two hundred pictures, and certainly did not spare himself. He was the first man to climb Mauna Loa when the eruption began. Besides these spectacular efforts, Mr. Davey has traveled the Islands through and has made a superb [illegible] tion of general views of coffee and sugar [illegible] ations and of the lovely scenery of the Par[illegible] of the Pacific.

Have You a Piano that You do not Use?

Is the piano in your home a musical instrument, and do you enjoy it as such, or does it remain unused for months at a time and become practically nothing more than an article of furniture.

The Pianola

Is bringing into use thousands of pianos that have been silent for many years.

It is bringing music into homes where it has long been a stranger.

It is making players of people who, lacking musical training, had never expected to experience the pleasure of producing music for themselves.

It is increasing the repertoire of amateur and professional pianists by making the entire literature of the piano instantly available without study and without practice.

The Pianola looks like a small cabinet. It has small felt-covered fingers that rest on the keys of the piano and, operated by pneumatic power, strike the keys with a pliant, yielding and remarkably sympathetic touch that is almost identical with that of the human fingers.

When not in use the Pianola may be easily detached from the piano and moved to another part of the room.

The Pianola can be used in connection with any Grand or Upright piano, and does not in any way mar or disfigure the instrument. It can be easily and quickly adjusted by any one.

The action of the Pianola is so simple that even a child can readily learn to play it; at the same time it is capable of so much expression that its greatest admirers are those who best understand and appreciate good music.

Price $250 Upward.

The Pianola can be bought by monthly payments. Our instruments are gladly shown to the merely curious as well as to intending purchasers.

IN BOOKDOM

WOMEN seem to be born with high ideals of manly efficiency. They seem to think that a man is a sort of twenty-five horse power gasoline engine, in point of strength, and they have rather hazy ideas as to his limitations in any but intellectual directions. A good healthy man ought to hoe twenty acres of potatoes in a day (or is it forty?); he ought to saw and split twelve cords of wood in the same length of time; to say nothing of what he should accomplish in light work, like pitching hay. Even after they have had a great deal of experience with that disappointing creature, man, women do not seem ever quite able to see the relationship existing between cause and effect, when a man figures in the cause and the effect is physical. They will always over-estimate the man's physical ability in comparison with their own. They will always exaggerate his powers of endurance.

The laboring man knows this, and he avoids womankind all he may, as an employer of his labor. The novelist knows it, too. He knows that it takes ten men to make a hero that will please his women-folk. He knows that his tale will never be questioned by a woman on the probability or improbability of its wildest action. He knows that nothing ever happens that couldn't happen, in a romance. He knows that his stock will sell for its par value all over the world. Knowing this, he is not obliged to deny himself anything in the way of excitement, since his hero can always be assured of a safe issue from present peril, whatever the straits. All that he has to do is to say that the splendid fellow escapes, and he has escaped. If he has to climb a moon-beam to do it—well?

The book of the month is Miss Mary Johnston's To Have and To Hold, with Houghton, Mifflin & Co.'s imprint on the title-page. Miss Johnston of course is a woman, and, other things being equal, she has a great advantage over the male novelist in the native possession of a belief in the human hero. She is not obliged to feign this belief. She as a woman was born with it. She can sit down and write out her dreams in all sincerity. Her hero is bound to be a man that can stand up against a whole ship load of pirates, or a dozen treacherous swordsmen, or whatever it be, and win out without straining the muscles of his back. Likewise, if that were the romantic thing to do, he could hoe his twenty acres of potatoes in a day, or split up his ten cords of wood. We are made to feel that the author believes he could do all this, and more, if she would let him.

Miss Johnston has written us an interesting historical romance, and we ought to be thankful to her for it. The action never lags. The pages are crammed full of incident from beginning to end. No Ulysses of them all ever had better steel in his sword than Ralph Percy, gentleman, of V:ginia, commonly known as the hero. Never lived fairer lady than the Lady Jocelyn Leigh, who became his wife. And the villain of the play, my Lord Carnal, favorite of the king, is as good a villain as any one could ask for.

To Have and To Hold is not in any sense a great novel, measured by classic standards. Its author has not yet attained to a large knowledge of men and women, and of the natural laws that govern their actions. She is disposed to ignore the fact that fire will burn, or that a day has twenty-four hours in it and no more. For the purposes of fiction fire will not burn, men will not die when they are killed, a day contains from thirty to sixty nours, a small open boat carries two masts (in order to have them carried away, first one, then the other, in a storm), and performs the strangest feats ever two-masted cat-boat performed amongst the breakers of a raging sea. Here is a description, for instance:

"To the shell-strewn beach of the outer of the two islets raced long lines of surf, and between us and it lurked a sand bar, against which the great rollers dashed with a bull-like roar. The wind drove us straight upon this bar. A moment of deadly peril and it had us fast, holding us for the waves to beat our life out. The boat listed, then rested, quivering through all its length. The waves pounded against its side, each watery battering-ram dissolving in foam and spray but to give place to another, and yet it held together and we lived. How long it would hold we could not tell; we only knew it could not be for long. The inclination of the boat was not so great but that, with caution, we might move about. There were on board rope and an axe. With the latter I cut the thwarts and the decking in the bow, and Diccon and I made a small raft. When it was finished, I lifted my wife in my arms and laid her upon it and lashed her to it with a rope."

Surely no more unique report ever was written of shipwreck. A tiny open boat, "with two masts," aground on a sand-bar in the raging Atlantic, but yet with its "inclination not so great but that with caution we might move about," the boat drawing perhaps two or three feet of water, while "each watery battering-ram dissolving in foam and spray" against its side tried to move it from its position, must have been a rare sight. Miss Johnston also is distinctly not to be congratulated upon her Indian complications toward the end of the story. They are a little bookish and commonplace, and retard the progress of a well-written and interesting romance.

NEW BOOKS.

A Manifest Destiny, by Julia Magruder, appears upon the title-page of one of the latest novels from the Harpers. The story is a simple one of a girl, whose beauty is her chief capital, and the young heir of a dukedom. The marriage is forbidden by the old duke; the girl in person intercedes; the duke is struck by her beauty and persuades her to marry him instead of ruining the prospects of the young heir his cousin; she, being ambitious, does this and repents at leisure; and it all comes out right in the end through the death of the old duke. Then there are explanations, and a reconciliation of the lovers. Mark Twain once spoke of music "being better than it sounded," and the same paradox is true of this plot as I have outlined it. The interest centers rather upon the sympathetic, if not entirely consistent, characterization, whereby the charms of a beautiful, intelligent and good woman are delineated.

Robert H. Greene, M.D., has written a book called Healthy Exercise (Harper & Bros.), in which he undertakes to state the laws of health in popular terms. Dr. Greene frankly states in his opening chapters that he is indebted to Dr. Fernand Le Grange, a Frenchman, who may be known to most of the readers of this paper as the author of a work entitled De l'Exercise Chez les Adultes, for many of his theoretical discussions as to the physiology of voluntary muscular contraction, and other hygienical data. But he does not say which ones. That is unfortunate. It would be too bad to blame Dr. Greene for Dr. Le Grange's affidavits, and likewise unfair to attribute to Dr. Le Grange sentiments for which Dr. Greene is responsible. Some of the chapters I fear a e rather carelessly written. None of them are very clearly written. To be of the greatest value, such a treatise should be both carefully and clearly written. When Dr. Greene (or Dr. Le Grange) on one page tells his readers that among those that grow fat are "those who suffer from some inflammatory or obstructive condition of the nose, throat, or lungs; this interferes with the proper oxygen supply for the needs of the system and leads to the diminution in the oxygenation of the food supplies, thus causing the storing up of fat in that manner, even if a small supply of food be taken;" and on the next page, that among those who grow lean are those "whose lungs do not receive a sufficient supply of oxygen to burn up the food supply," what is the layman to think? However, the charts of exercises at the back of the book apparently are both consistent and valuable.

Mr. E. Phillips Oppenheim has a romance upon this desk from the press of the J. B. Lippincott Co., and The Man and His Kingdom is the title of it. The scene of the tale is laid in South America, on the island of San Martina, all in the manner of Richard Harding Davis. There is, to be sure, no man over six feet tall in Mr. Oppenheim's story, which is absurd, according to Mr. Davis; otherwise The Man and His Kingdom might pass anywhere as the work of one not its author. Mr. Oppenheim is not making the most of his unusual talents. He might have passed for Mr. Davis by some hook or crook long ago, and sold his books into the hundreds of thousands. If he had begun in time he might even have compelled Mr. Davis to pass for him. Who knows?

In Mr. Oppenheim's latest romance we have for a central character a wealthy Englishman named Dene, who goes to San Martina with a co-operative colony of agriculturists. The President of San Martina has a beautiful daughter, who has been educated in Europe. The girl falls in love with the young Englishman, and he with her. There are a great many complications, plots, revolutions, and things of that kind, centering more or less around a scape-grace son of the President and one Sagasta, an English revolutionist in the island. This Sagasta has a sweetheart, also an English girl, who had married the President's son time gone by, but had never lived with him. The solution of things need not be explained further than by saying that Dene becomes President of San Martina in the end, and the lovers are all brought out of the woods.

Miss Mary E. Wilkins has added another book of short stories to her already long list of titles, calling it simply by the name of the first story, The Love of Parson Lord. This title-story is the study of a father's love for his child, and the way in which that father-love got around certain vows he as a stiff-necked Puritan minister had made to God as to his daughter. He had promised to give his surplus income to foreign missions, and his daughter to the service of God; but instead of doing just that, he bought dolls and dresses and little vanities for Love, bestowing them anonymously, as though they had come from a rich neighbor. Then, when her hand was asked in marriage by that one who could best make her happy, he kept the letter of his vow by refusing his consent, but broke the spirit of it by aiding in every way, and surreptitiously, the plea of that lover for a marriage without his consent. The second story, The Tree of Knowledge, is the study of a lonely young girl's romance with an unknown correspondent by means of a hollow in an old oak tree. It transpired that an elder sister was writing these mysterious letters to her, making them as noble as herself. A real lover came later, in a way undreamed of by anyone, least of all by that sister. All three, I believe, of the remaining stories have had previous magazine publication. Of these, Catherine Carr is a patriotic story of 1814; The Three Old Sisters and the Old Beau a slight character-sketch; and One Good Time a story of how a down-trodden wife when her husband died went to New York and blew in every cent of the life insurance money. The book is published by Harper & Bros.

The reader of this paper will be pleased to learn that there is at least one dreaded disease that science has been able to cure in all its stages, and that is Catarrh. Hall's Catarrh Cure is the only positive cure known to the medical fraternity. Catarrh being a constitutional disease, requires a constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure is taken internally, acting directly upon the blood and mucous surfaces of the system, thereby destroying the foundation of the disease, and giving the patient strength by building up the constitution and assisting nature in doing its work. The proprietors have so much faith in its curative powers that they offer One Hundred Dollars for any case that it fails to cure. Send for list of testimonials.

A TAILOR-MADE MAHATMA

THIS is the story of the dismemberment of the Brooklyn Society for Amateur Psychical Research. It was composed of thirty true believers and one scoffer. The true believers and one Mahatma kept the society in high standing in the world of the flesh and the spirit world for a year; the one scoffer punctured the bubble in a night.

I was in at the death. That I was not in at the birth, so to speak, was not my fault; I did not learn of the existence of the Brooklyn Society for Amateur Psychical Research, until just before the gaudy climax which marked its finish. Barbara raked me into it. Barbara is beautiful beyond a doubt, and wonderfully interesting, but she is one of the unquiet of her sex. I have often wished that she lived in San Francisco, because, with Chinatown and strange restaurants and like vents of the so-called "Bohemian" sort, and a city of people who mind their business, there are many ways for a San Francisco girl to blow off her superfluous soul in innocent thrills. But she lives in the City of Churches, where things are—different. She used to swap souls, but lately she has been going in for theosophy, with all the etceteras from spiritualism clear to black magic. I will let Barbara tell of the beginnings as she told them to me:

"Do you believe it—really? Then you mustn't tell, now will you? We have a tailor-made Mahatma."

"A tailor-made ——"

"It is funny, isn't it? But you would understand if you saw her. I got so dreadfully tiresome, meeting every other Tuesday evening after the theatre, and watching Mrs. Sturtevant Hynes tip tables and Mr. Jenkins go off into trances, and all that, and listening to Mrs. Posen read from Madame Blavatsky, that we'd made up our minds that we weren't a harmonic circle after all, and unless you're harmonic and have sympathetic vibrations or synthetic chords—I think that's it—you can't get it at all—"

"What's It?"

"Oh, Nirvina or something. Anyway, Mr. Perkins said that what we needed was a mahatma. And she came—and ever since that, it's been perfectly lovely."

"What's this It?"

"Oh, lectures and manifestations and things. Do you know, I didn't like her at all at first? She was—handsome. And all the men said that she was beautiful. I never did care for those big, black eyes put in with a dirty thumb. But her lectures have been just splendid! All about Mahatmas and development of our higher astral selves and Sanskrit and those funny little magic things. And she says that none of us need despair, because if we only macerate the spiritual self and absorb her lectures a little longer, we can all separate our astral bodies from self and see manifestations like Mr. Jenkins—if we have faith; and I think that I have faith, don't you? Wouldn't it be lovely to soar——"

"And where does the Mahatma come off?"

"I don't understand—"

"How much vulgar, dross, unpsychical coin does she get out of this?"

"We'l, you see, Mahatmas come high, and I think that she is very reasonable for a real one. She charges only five dollars a lecture—we have one every week——"

"Five dollars each? And how many are there of you?"

"Only thirty. She says that if you truly believe in the vasicular submergation of the physical, dross, objective ethos—I think that's the way it goes—that you shouldn't mind vulgar money, because you'd pay money for millinery and things and this is more than millinery. It does look reasonable that way, doesn't it?"

I had to admit that it looked very reasonable for the Mahatma. I would lecture once a week, myself, at a nine hundred and fifty per. The matter seemed fit for investigation and worth a small investment. And so the next week beheld me received on probation into the B. S. of A. P. S. I found the membership to be composed of some of the rich and influential people of the city of churches—solid and substantial folk who ought to have known better. I was the one grovelling and inquisitive scoffer, though it is on my conscience that I concealed the fact. We met twice a week. One night was devoted to table tilting and manifestations; on the other, the tailor-made Mahatma lectured and told us about the astral bodies in our insides. Her symbolic jargon is beyond my power to reproduce, and so is her beauty of person. Such eyes—such midnight hair—such a form! She told us one evening that she was the daughter of a French-Canadian, and that her last incarnation was on Neptune. If she is a sample of the inhabitants of Neptune, I bespeak the belted planet for my next translation.

Let us pass over the lectures wherein she explained to us the gradual evolution of the human soul, from beast up to Mahatmas. Sufficient it is to say that she led us up by degrees to the perfect knowledge wherein our astral bodies might be liberated from the frail tenement of flesh and soar—and soar. One evening, she created a profound sensation by announcing that the time had come for the final sitting, wherein complete separation should be achieved. It would not cost much; only faith in the universal unity and self-abnegation and a fee of about four times the usual lecture price. Slessinger, a retired banker, became so enthused that he stood treat for the whole society, and handed over the money at once. The Mahatma announced that the surroundings in the society's regular rooms were not sufficiently in agreement with the permeating influences of nature; we could accomplish complete self-submergation only in her own apartments, where the harmonies were observed.

Behold us, therefore, on the appointed night, gathered in her rooms in an uptown apartment-house. But it was no tailor-made Mahatma who greeted us. 'Twas a Being in a yellow robe, with wavy black hair falling over the soft stuff. The apartment was dim, mysterious. Before the divan on which she sat, never deigning to rise as we entered, burned a censer. We waited in silence. Presently she spoke, directing the men to go to the right and the women to the left into two small anterooms, and don robes like hers. When we returned and formed the circle again, a great change had come over the appearance of the assemblage. There was a mystic, Oriental air about it. The Arabian Nights came to my mind. The Mahatma rose and faced us. The light about her was dim and uncertain. At her left hand stood an ebony table, bearing a book or two, an ivory wand, and a jug of curious Roman pottery.

"My friends and pupils," she said in her rich, drowsy voice, "we have come to the final test of our faith. Prepare, therefore. Banish all thought of earthly things. Dispose your minds to calm, and soon you shall be face to face with the mysteries of creation, and float with those shadowy beings whose forms are so misshapen and indistinct at the first trial, and so clear to an adept. Wherefore, listen to the words of Veda," and then she spieled Sanskrit for awhile. The room was filled with a mysterious perfume, the light was dim, and I, being a scoffer and suffering no excitement, was growing sleepy.

"You are now ready," she said. "Fear not. But before you go, drink, each of you, a little of the wine of Achitophel, that your earthly bodies may keep warm for your return."

She poured from the jug into a set of little earthen beakers. We drank. I sipped the curious, rather bitter liquid, with misgiving, but the eye of the Mahatma was on me. The perfume seemed heavier, the room dimmer, the voice of the prophetess, speaking reassuring words, more drowsy.

I was in space, with nothing under or above me, just lying on the ether in absolute rest. It was neither bright nor dark, a region filled with filtered light, like the caves of the sea. I must have lain a century like that, when I was aware of wonderful music, music such as I had never heard before. I began to look for its source. For delighted ages and ages I soared on and on, searching, searching, with that music in my ears. Suddenly I was aware of a man seated at an organ made of gold and jaspar, like the walls of the New Jerusalem. The music died away, as I came upon him, and was succeeded by heavenly odors, a symphony of scents. By and by he turned toward me. He had a diamond for one eye and an opal for the other.

"You have made a beat on them all," he said. This isn't exactly what he said; it was put in higher-sounding language, but 'tis what it meant.

"How is that?" I ventured to ask.

"Heaven and earth are to be destroyed tomorrow, and you have the exclusive story." I was now aware, without his telling me, that he was a celestial city editor. "It is a scoop. Would you like to see the presses?"

The odors swept over me again; I was transported to a region where pressmen in yellow robes were putting forms of ruby type—real ruby—on a golden press. It began to run at a speed beyond all conception and then even faster than that—faster and faster. I faded away on the ether again. The next thing I remember was a fall through infinite space, and a jar which shocked every bone and every nerve, and lo, I was lying on my divan, looking into the dark eyes of the tailor-made Mahatma. She was waving her ivory wand to and fro, and her countenance wore an expression of beatific joy. The other investigators lay sleeping with ashen faces, all but one or two, who, like me, had wakened oversoon. One by one they shivered, moaned and awoke. The Mahatma spoke reassuring words and bade us begone. We crept into the anterooms, doffed our yellow robes and departed.

I awoke next morning with a sensation not totally unfamiliar in my head, and an old memory came back to me with a jump—a night in San Francisco when an East Indian from Calcutta had told me something of his people and initiated me into some of their customs. I went to the next seance with a small, wide-necked bottle, closed with a tight stopper, strapped about my neck. I pulled that stopper as I donned the yellow robe, and chose a moment when the Mahatma was not looking to receive the wine of Achitophel in the bottle. One by one, the eyes of the others grew heavy, and they fell over in deep sleep; I pretended to do the same. The Mahatma watched us narrowly for a time; then she passed into the next room. When she returned, I detected an odor of absinthe and cigarettes. Settling herself into an attitude very undignified for a tailor-made Mahatma, she looked at us with an expression of intense amusement. An investigator stirred. She took up her wand and began to wave it in air, with her characteristic drowsy gesture.

As we left, Slessinger confided in me that the Mahatma was the real thing. He said that he had been leading a chorus of ten thousand houris with a golden staff. Only, he thought that the reaction caused by the reunion of the astral body and the tenement of clay was somewhat trying. I agreed with him. I had not then recovered from the previous seance, nor have I done so yet. I still have that tired feeling in my head mornings. I have it now.

But an analysis of the wine of Achitophel "is before me as I write." Here is an extract:

"Dear Sir:—The liquid you left us for analysis is made up of nine parts of good California sherry and one part of Cannabis Indica, known also as hasheesh and Indian hemp. Cannabis Indica is a drug which has the power of making the beholder see wonderful dreams and hallucinations. The quantity in the sample you have given me would, if taken internally, make the recipient see green planets fighting with purple angels."

The tailor-made Mahatma has moved her lodgings. Barbara has taken up the study of Maeterlink.

IN THE MATTER OF
H. SOCHAT, Bankrupt

Take notice, that H. Sochat, bankrupt, IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE UNITED STATES in and for the Northern District of California, above named, has been duly adjudicated bankrupt under the Act of Congress of July 1, 1898, and that the first meeting of the creditors has been called to meet at the office of the undersigned at room 94, Chronicle building, San Francisco, California, on Saturday the 7th day of April, 1900, at the hour of 11 o'clock a. m., for the purpose of proving their claims against the estate of said bankrupt; and that at the same time and place the creditors whose claims have been duly proven and allowed shall appoint one or three trustees of said estate.

Dated San Francisco, March 26th 1900.

MILTON J. GREEN,
Referee in Bankruptcy,
In and for the City and County of San Francisco

"On the Suwanee River" begins a week's engagement at the California Sunday afternoon. It is a comedy-drama which comes to San Francisco with a good Eastern reputation, As the name indicates, the scene is laid in the South. Stella Mayhew, as the colored "mammy," appears in the star part. James Neill and his stock company follow with an extended engagement.

NEW YORK THEATRICALS

Fashions in Plays. Blanche Bates as "Mme. Butterfly."

NEW YORK first-nighters are wondering what sort of a play is going to be the fashion for next season. We ran through romantic melodrama this year and finished with it. The short-lived craze for the salacious died with "Sapho." Heaven chooses strange instruments to do the work of righteousness; no stranger one could have been chosen to down our immoral drama than the World, beside whose Sunday supplement the Frenchy playbook is as a prayer-book. But 'tis done, the craze is over, and we are ready for the next fashion. The new productions of this fag-end of the season give no hint as to its character. With the exception of "Madame Butterfly," which is too short to have much influence, they are mediocre and are cast on conventional lines. A few months ago, when "The Cowboy and the Lady" was announced, I looked to that play to lead a new fashion, the exploitation of the fast-passing Wild West, which has hitherto been left to cheap melodrama. But it turned out to be an invertebrate sort of a play, and too weak to lead anything. I am convinced that had Clyde Fitch succeeded in this venture, we would have had a Western craze next season. For we are in the state of thought where one single piece of merit will set things a-going.

Possibly, it will be a revival of the classic drama. Every successful actor arrives at a stage when nothing will do for him but that he have a fling at Shakespeare. A number of our younger actors and actresses come to that state of being next season, and we have their announcements in advance. In addition to that, I base my prophecy of a Shakespearean revival on the fact that the classic drama is used, in these days, as a "filler." It is an undignified position for the Bard of Avon, but it is nevertheless his place in the modern theatre. Whenever there is a hiatus between fashions, they go back to Shakespeare and the heroic dramas which follow in the wake—"Richelieu," "Ingomar," "Virginius," "Francesca da Rimini,"—our one permanent American play—and the others of that ilk. We have no Booth, no Barrett, no Salvini in this generation, but who knows but that Booth's successor may be found next season? Young Salvini, who was about to take the robe of the Prince of Players when he died, was thought of only as the mediocre son of a great father, so long as he lingered on in the romantic drama; his Hamlet, tried a year or so before his death, proved that a new star had risen in the master drama.

Three players who made their first successes as mimics of stage celebrities are even now having their first attempts at admission to a higher grade. The rise of Nat Goodwin from a vaudeville turn—in the days when no star ever essayed vaudeville—to society drama and refined comedy, is too well known to need mention. He has his most serious role in "When We Were Twenty-One," H. V. Esmond's new play, which comes as an antidote to the "Zaza" series; and he is understood to be on his way to Shakespearian tragedy. Bertie the Lamb as Macbeth—well, stranger things have happened. Cissie Loftus, who has been a star attraction at the concert halls in her imitations of famous actors, is trying her hand at Shakespeare and Scribe with Madame Modjeska. It is a costly ambition. She is worth five hundred dollars a week at the concert halls, while Modjeska can hardly pay her one-fifth of that amount. It is her first attempt at "the legit," and it is not to fair to judge her, but so far she has shown none of the spontaneity which marks her concert hall work. She is intelligent and loveable, and that is all. She must pull herself together and act with all the might which is in her if she hopes for a success.

The third departure is that of Tim Murphy, whose low comedy was even lower than that of Goodwin and Miss Loftus. He makes his legitimate appearance in "The Carpetbagger," a play which illustrates several things that ought not to be done in play-writing. An attempt is made to show the development of a character, a thing which can be done in a novel, but which cannot be brought out in the precious few minutes of the play. It has never been done successfully, if "Hamlet" be excepted. Again, the plot depends upon politics of a sort too intricate to be understood by the uninitiated. All this confusion and mixture is in what might have been a successful play. Murphy himself proves his right to a place among legitimate comedians. His attractive personality and acting strangely subtle for one just out of the vaudeville atmosphere, give promise of a continued success.

May Robson, for long years the caricaturist of the Frohman forces and creator of "the cook lady" in "Why Smith Left Home," has gone to the opposite direction. She is winning new honors in "Sapolio," the Weber & Field burlesque on "Sapho." Indeed, she is so amusing in her unctuous caricature of Miss Nethersole that she may remain in burlesque permanently, which would be a very good thing for her financially. "The "funny man" is as common as dirt, but the funny woman is a scarce article and comes high.

I must not slight "Madame Butterfly" because, an ye hear me, it is the best play of the season, short curtain-raiser though it be. By this time you must know its salient points—the adaptation of John Luther Long's story, the successful acting of Blanche Bates in the last role where she would be expected to make a success, and the "night of silence," that scene wherein a night is supposed to pass and not a word is spoken. It was a daring thing. Any new playwright who might have brought such a scene to a manager would have waited all his life for a production. But Belasco had the reputation, and the event proved his judgment. The scene representing the all-night wait of the deserted wife lasts ten minutes. Blanche Bates holds center stage all that time, and besides keeping silence, she rarely moves. The passage of time is indicated by stage "business." The scene is an interior. The wife sees through the window her husband's ship come into the bay. She makes the room bright and arranges flowers for his coming; he does not come. The lights grow dim, night falls, a servant enters with a lamp. She places the baby beside the mother and joins the vigil herself. The babe falls asleep, so does the servant, and the mother (Miss Bates) is left sitting, looking out into the darkness. The lamps burn out and die. The gray dawn comes and day breaks. Not a word, only the barest possible gesture—and yet the women cried. 'Tis a woman's tragedy.

Heaven knows how a stalwart Diana like Blanche Bates can suggest the Japanese doll, but she does it, although not with entire success. This was partly achieved by picking giants for the rest of the cast. Even then the illusion was not perfect, but otherwise she was splendid. It takes a mimic to give the accent and manner of such a part, and it takes a real actor to make successful such a scene as the silent one.

DRAYTON.

A Scene from "On The Suwanee River," at the California next week.

AT THE THEATRES.

THE stage tramp has succeeded rag-time as the ruling vaudeville turn. Jugglers, musicians, acrobats and monologue artists endeavor to put comedy into their "stunts" by the rags and tatters of Dusty Rhodes. We have three of them on this week's Orpheum bill alone. One of the cleverest is W. C. Fields, a tramp juggler who is a little more comedian than juggler, though clever at both. Fields is really only a boy, being twenty years old and young in appearance for his age. He says that his start as a juggler and Isaac Newton's discovery of the law of gravitation came about through the same sort of accident.

"I was a boy of fourteen and had gone up to the country from Philadelphia, my home. I was sitting under a pear tree when some pears were shaken down by the wind. I picked up some of them and began to toss them up and try to juggle them. Somehow, I became fascinated with the trick, and practiced it all the weeks I was in the country. By the time I returned to town, I could juggle three balls with one hand, and I decided to keep it up. I made up my mind to practice an hour every day for a year. At the end of that time I made my first public appearance and scored a hit. A year more of practice, and I went into the business. It was all a matter of natural knack and steady work. I am sure that you need the knack, because one or two other boys, who began to try when I did, and practiced just as hard, made no headway at all.

"It is a curious thing about the business that certain of my hardest tricks get no applause at all, while some of the easiest bring a great 'hand.' For instance, there is the 'pawnshop' trick, where I juggle three balls close together just in front of my face. It is funny, I suppose, but it does not seem difficult to the audience, yet it is my toughest 'stunt.' Some of my tricks with cigar boxes are very easy, and anyone ought to be able to learn them, but audiences generally applaud them generously.

"Another curious thing is that 'misses' run in series. For weeks I will never make a single blunder, and then there will be several days in succession when I miss ten or a dozen times at each performance. There is no apparent reason; my nerves and health and everything seem as good as ever. I just get started wrong, and can't get right. Of course, constant practice is necessary. If I stop a single day, my work shows it."

The Tivoli began the week with a good-humored house and what was plainly the first production in this country of "Manila Bound." The opera was only three acts in length, but it lasted until midnight. Extra business favorably received was largely responsible for the delay. Indeed, the comedy itself was merely an excuse, a sort of clothes-line on which Ferris Hartman and crew might hang their funny carpets to beat the dust out of them. Long waits between acts, an interminably long second act, and considerable superfluous matter in the third, also had something to do with the midnight curtain. But the house received the whole thing with great good humor, distributing vociferous if somewhat uncritical encores to everyone in sight. The ladies in the company seemed to earn all the honors for singing, Miss Graham doing especially well. Miss Merrill has a rather unwieldy mezzo voice; but she has a good stage presence and was popular. Miss Cotte's clear soprano was also heard to advantage. Miss Myers had the leading soprano role. Mr. Wheelan as the attorney was a great bore. He certainly is not a success as a caricaturist. Loud mouthing of lines does not constitute humor, nor does the frantic and purposeless dashing up and down the stage constitute a parody upon action. A man may have bumble bees in his hat and still be an actor. Musically, not much need be said about "Manila Bound." It is essentially a vaudeville opera, and as such will be popular.

It would be rash to state that Paderewski plays more magnificently than he did four years ago. Then, he was a supreme artist, a master of all the resources of the instrument. Today he is no less so, but he is also a little more. He is now a greater man. He is surer of himself. He is less impeded by technicalities; he can more easily, more adequately render his conception of a composition. He can make it stand out, raise and lower it according as he feels, with infinitely less effort.

Since Paderewski was here we have heard all the great modern pianists. Sauer alone is to be named in the same breath. Yet the German had not the wonderful range or the great strength of Paderewski. Rosenthal had greater speed, but he lacked the poetry and soul the Pole infuses into his renderings. It must be admitted he is the greatest artist of the period, and it behooves those who care for divine pianoforte playing to hear him.

"El Capitan," the best legitimate success of the Morosco company this season, is having a revival at the Grand this week. The part made famous by De Wolf Hopper is well handled by William Wolff. It is really his best role. The strong ensemble required by the Sousa opera just suits Jones' strong and well-drilled chorus, so that the whole goes with a swing.

Matthews and Harris, comedians, bring a sketch, "Adam the Second," to the new bill at the Orpheum next week. Vashti Earle and Lulu Shepard are two American comediennes who made a hit at the last London pantomime season. Carrie Behr is a singing comedienne who combines musical talent with good looks. Harry Cogill and May Arles have a musical comedy sketch entitled "A Warm Lunch."

Willie Collier presents his amusing "Mr. Smooth" at the Columbia all the week, including Sunday evening. W. H. West's Big Minstrel Jubilee follows. Some attractive novelties are promised.

"Quo Vadis" is to have an elaborate presentation at the Alcazar next week. Special scenery and costumes have been procured to meet the wide requirements of this highly-colored historical drama.

Paderewski will give his last recital at the California Theatre on Monday afternoon, April 2nd. It is barely possible that he may be heard in a grand orchestral concert before he leaves the state. In that event, he will play Beethoven's Emperor Concerto in E flat and a Polish fantasy of his own composition.

THE PREVAILING FEELING.—An English Member of Parliament visiting Dublin asked his waiter in the hotel, a facetious old Celt, "When are you going to get Home Rule in Ireland, John?" "See ye here, sorr," said the old man; "the only way we'll get Home Rule for ould Ireland will be if France—an' Russia—an' Germany—an' Austria—an' maybe Italy—if they would all join together to give those blaygiards of English a rare good hiding. That's the only way we'll get Home Rule, annyway." Then, as he looked cautiously round, a twinkle of cunning and a smile of courtesy were added to his expression. "And the whole lot of 'em shoved together couldn't do it," he said. "Oh—it's the grand navy we've got!"

EVARTS'S REASON FOR LONGEVITY—An old friend called on Senator Evarts, who recently celebrated his eighty-second birthday, and asked how he accounted for his longevity. He pursued: "You have been a hard worker. You have eaten and drunk whenever you were hungry and thirsty, and have been what we call a free liver. You have never taken care of yourself and were not born with a strong physique. Why is it that you have outlived nearly all of our contemporaries?" "I suppose it's because I have never taken any exercise," said Mr. Evarts, grimly.

TOO READILY ACCEPTED.—In the House of Commons, some years ago, Gladstone had made an impassioned speech in favor of the union of Wallachia and Moldavia. Disraeli pointed out that the result would be to destroy the independence of these people, and the only thing left would be the remorse "which would be painted with admirable eloquence by the rhetorician of the day." In reply, Mr. Gladstone said that he would not be guilty of the affected modesty of pretending to be ignorant that the designation, "the rhetorician of the day," was intended for himself. "I beg your pardon! I really did not mean that!" Mr. Disraeli interrupted, smiling happily—for Gladstone had fallen into his trap.

A LOGICAL DEDUCTION.—A good grand parent was chatting amicably with his little granddaughter, who was snugly ensconced on his knee. "What makes your hair so white, grandpa?" the little miss queried. "I am very old, my dear; I was in the ark," replied his lordship, with a painful disregard of the truth. "Oh! are you Noah?" "No." "Are you Shem, then?" "No, I am not Shem." "Are you Ham?" "No." "Then," said the little one, who was fast nearing the limit of her biblical knowledge, "you must be Japhet." A negative reply was given to this query also. "But, grandpa, if you are not Noah, or Shem, or Ham, or Japhet, you must be a beast."

x

NOT A CHRISTIAN.—State Treasurer Jim Davidson of Wisconsin was at a revival meeting in a small town near Madison and was lulled into semi-somnolence by the eloquence of the divine. At the critical stage of the meeting young men went round the congregation inquiring "Are you a Christian?" Most people replied in the affirmative. When they came to Davidson, he did not catch the import of the query. He replied, "No, ah bin Norwegian."

x

A DECEPTIVE HERO.—A large dry goods firm in Liverpool, being gratified at the volunteering of one of its employees for service in South Africa, offered to pay half his wages to his wife in his absence. At the end of the month the woman appeared, and the moiety was at once given her. "What?" she said. "Four pound?" "Yes," replied the senior partner, "that is exactly half; sorry you are not satisfied." "It isn't that I'm not satisfied. Why, for years he has told me he only got sixteen shillings altogether, and—and—if the Boers don't kill him I will."

x

HIS LEADING CONTRIBUTION.—A strange parson who had preached in a Staffordshire parish was amazed at the conduct of the warden, who, after the service, proceeded to take from the plate the largest coin thereon and carefully pocket it. "What are you about?" he gasped. The warden only smiled. "I have led the collection in this church for a dozen years with this half-crown," he remarked, "and I am not going to part with it."

x

THE QUIVER OF HIS LIPS.—Sir Robert Peel was once going through a picture collection with a friend where there was a portrait of a prominent Englishman who was famous for saying sharp things. "How wonderfully like!" said the friend. "You can see the quiver on his lips." "Yes," replied Sir Robert, "and the arrows coming out of it."

x

THE IRISHMAN'S TRIBUTE.—An Irishman with Lord Methuen thus addressed a group of his comrades: "Be jabers, this is a fine counthry for a soldier! Ye gets a blade of grass six inches high, and ye take cover behind it, and they nicks it off inch by inch, and when it gets to the last inch, be jabers, look out!"

EVENTS CURRENT.

Another British Disaster in South Africa.

The week has not been a successful one for British arms. Increased Boer activity is reported everywhere. The most important engagement noted occurred almost within hearing of the main imperial army. Lord Roberts wires that on March 30th Colonel Broadwood, with a considerable force, was at Thabanchu, thirty-eight miles east of Bloemfontein, when his communications were threatened by flying columns of Boers. He retired upon the water-works, seventeen miles nearer his base. The next morning the enemy again threatened his camp, and he immediately dispatched two horse artillery batteries and his baggage toward Bloemfontein, under cavalry escort. Some two miles from the waterworks the road crosses a deep nullah or spruit. In this spruit a large force of Boers had concealed themselves during the night; and so well were they hidden that the leading British scouts passed over the drift, according to Lord Roberts's account, without discovering them. When the wagons and guns were quite within the drift a murderous fire was poured into the transport at short range. The Kaffir drivers of the convoy at once stampeded, leaving their teams. Scores of the artillery drivers were shot down by the first volley. The British re-formed with great steadiness, but were obliged to abandon their entire baggage train of one hundred wagons, together with seven field guns. The casualities were nearly four hundred, including over two hundred captured by the Boers. The Bloemfontein water-works are situated only some twenty-one miles east of the city; and the significance of this latest disaster to the British arms lies in that fact, and in the repetition of the inefficient British scouting that has already caused so great loss of life in this war. Telegrams from Kimberley state that the Boers are again becoming active along the Vaal river. Pretoria dispatches speak of renewed fighting near Mafeking in which Colonel Plumer's column was forced to retire with loss. Lord Methuen's difficulties are apparently increasing. He has Boer laagers or guerrilla bands on three sides of him to threaten his communications with the Orange river. Strong forces of Boers are reported in every direction from Bloemfontein. Altogether the British situation is by no means so bright as it was, in the Orange Free State. General Buller is still at Ladysmith, however; and a successful advance by him on Pretoria at this juncture might change the military situation as completely as that by Lord Roberts on Bloemfontein. Meanwhile the autumn rains are coming on and winter is imminent.

The Interstate Commerce Commission and Coast Rates.

The jobbers of the Pacific Coast are being given this week an opportunity of presenting to the Interstate Commerce Commission their side of the current controversy about through and differential railroad rates. Some time ago the Business Men's League of St. Louis entered a complaint before the Commission against the existing freight rates on commodities in carload lots, and also against present rates to the Coast and intermediate points on less than carload lots, the complaint alleging that a San Francisco jobber, for instance, by virtue of the wholesalers' carload rate, is enabled to bring goods from the East to that city and re-ship them from thence to interior points at less than the cost of goods and freight when shipped direct. The cities of the Coast, of course, are opposed to a change. It was shown in the testimony before the Commission at San Francisco that the rates complained of were forced upon the railroads by water competition. If the through rates were raised the railroads would lose most of their heavy business, as they did in 1893-96, when a clipper line of freight ships was established and supported by Coast jobbers. Prices to interior merchants would not be materially affected by any such proposed "equalization" of rates. The area of distribution would merely be reduced, and many towns naturally tributary to the great Coast ports would have to trade instead with the more distant cities of Chicago and St. Louis. The Mississippi river city, it was shown, is asking for more than its share of the jobbing trade. It would, under ordinary circumstances, be enabled to sell west to the watershed. It is asking now for trade as far west as Bakersfield. The Commission will proceed from San Francisco to Portland and Seattle, where it will hold sittings.

The Philippines and the President's Commissioners.

Secretary Root last week issued orders creating an entirely new military division to be known as the Division of the Pacific, and to embrace the Philippine archipelago. The division in turn is divided into four military departments. The department of northern Luzon will be commanded by General Bates; that of the Viscayas, by General Hughes; and General Kobbe will be in charge of the two departments of Mindanao and Jolo. The new Philippine Commission, with Judge Taft at its head as the personal representative of the President, is about to leave for Manila. It will have entire control over the army and navy in the Philippines, as well as over civil affairs. The military situation in the islands is unchanged. Copies of official Filipino documents captured by the American troops were sent to the Senate during the week, by the President, in compliance with a resolution. The most interesting paper is a translation of the minutes of a meeting of the Filipino junta at Hong Kong on May 5, 1898, four days after Dewey's victory, and only a few hours after the news of that victory had reached the world. At that meeting it was decided to prepare the Filipinos to fight the United States, and measures were taken to secure arms for the Tagalos. Thus official Filipino documents confirm the belief that the outbreak was the result of a prearranged plot.

American Rule in Guam.

Reports indicate that Captain Leary, governor of Guam, has been remarkably successful with his work of reconstructing the island's government and establishing a stable and permanent American rule. Guam, with its ten thousand natives and handful of Spaniards, was in a pitiable condition when it passed under our control. The government of the Spanish was corrupt and hard. The few priests ruled by superstition. The marriage bond had nearly fallen into disuse. The oppression of governors and officials was such that as soon as a man acquired any property, it was taken from him on some pretext or other. Therefore, there was no encouragement for industry. Leary went to work quietly, with the view of making his change gradual. The restoration of the marriage tie was one of his first actions. The institution became popular, and is now practically universal. One of the qualifications for matrimony was the ability to support a wife and the desire to go to work, thus providing an incentive to industry. The next step was the reduction of fast and feast days. Under the old regime, half the days in the year were made legal holidays, when it was unlawful to work. These days of idleness were cut down one-half, and will be diminished further in the future. The Spanish laws were overhauled, and land titles were revived and re-established. This proved hard work, and is not yet completed. A new scale of taxes was adopted, light enough not to be oppressive and heavy enough to run the island government. There were four priests in Guam when our occupation began. Three of these were corruptionists and were driven from the island. The fourth, Padre José, is an honest and virtuous man and has the respect of the natives; he has been permitted to remain. Schools and hospitals have been established, and public works projected which will give employment to all who need or deserve it. The auxiliary cruiser Yosemite has been making soundings in the harbor and reports it deep enough for any ship afloat. It is somewhat exposed to southern monsoons, but a breakwater, which can be built at small expense, will correct all that. It is recommended that, for the present, an opening be made through the coral into an inner pool or basin, where there will be absolutely safe dockage. A new town will doubtless be created on the harbor, as the present capital is about five miles inland.

Spread of Arbitration.

It has been asserted that the late Peace Conference at the Hague was an absolute failure, The records of the nine months since it adjourned go to disprove the assertion. A number of conventions and protocols providing for the adjustment of claims by arbitration have recently been concluded. The United States has closed such agreements with Great Britain, Germany, Chili, Hayti, Guatemala and Nicaragua and is negotiating with Russia. The agreement between this country, Great Britain and Germany has for its object the adjustment of Samoan claims. The arbitrator is King Oscar of Sweden. The treaty with Chili revives the claims convention of 1892, providing for the adjustment of matters left by that convention when it adjourned in 1892. The procotal with Hayti has reference to damages sustained by an American lumber firm. The agreement with Guatemala submits to arbitration a railroad claim held by an American citizen against the Guatemalan government. The British consul-general to Guatemala is arbitrator. The agreement with Nicaragua also relates to an injury to a private corporation. A claims convention with Russia is in process of negotiation. Some time ago, several American vessels engaged in sealing and whaling in Russian waters were seized by the czar's officials. Our government protesting, the Russian government agreed to leave the matter to arbitration. An agreement to this end was concluded, but no definite method of procedure was adopted. This still hangs fire, and the new convention has for its object the final settlement of these claims.

Slow Progress on Porto Rico Tariff.

The settlement of the Porto Rico tariff question which has already taken up far too much time in Congress is still deferred, although there is a possibility that it will be settled by the end of this week. Senator Foraker announces that he will make every effort to push the Porto Rico government bill, which includes a tariff provision, through the Senate. The Republicans of both houses have been in caucus the whole week and are said to have reached a tentative agreement. By the terms of this alleged compromise, the tariff for the island is to remain as fixed by the House measure, fifteen per cent of the Dingley Act, but with free trade for such foodstuffs as are now on the free list and with absolute free trade at the end of two years, providing that by that time the Legislature created in the Senate act shall have established some regular means of raising revenue. The free trade Republicans are very obstinate, however, and threaten to block any such compromise. The caucus will work this week to beat these men into line. A hint that the Porto Rico matter had already taken up too much valuable time was conveyed from the White House to the dissenting Republicans last week. It is timely for as it is, the greater problems of Legislation will be shelved this session. The island of Porto Rico is in an impoverished condition; though not so bad as is pretended by the yellow Democratic press and correspondents of the Creelman order, yet there is considerable distress and industry is paralyzed as a result of the change in condition. Congress passed a bill for a relief appropriation last week.

The Indian Famine.

Famine in India has spread to such an alarming extent that 5,000,000 people are now dependent on government aid, nearly four times that number are on the verge of starvation, and about 35,000,000 are living on insufficient food. It is believed that large areas will suffer from lack of population for many years. There is a dismal outlook for the future. The natives are slow about appealing for relief and relief work, so that many are past help when they apply. The leaves of the pepul tree and oil cakes such as are fed to cattle are the best foods eaten by the people when other provisions fail. This diet so injures their digestion that they ordinarily die as soon as they return to regular provender. Deaths from this cause and from utter exhaustion are so common that fires are kept going around the relief works night and day, to burn the bodies of the victims. In some provinces, lack of water is an added terror. Of course, along with this scarcity has gone a rise in the prices of food. The resources of the Indian government are totally inadequate to meet the growing want of the population, and the contributions from private sources are so small that, unless the British Parliament takes some action, a complete collapse of efforts to stem the famine is expected. The wealthy natives are even more indifferent than the whites. Some of the native merchants and princes are possessed of great wealth, yet there is no organized movement to meet the emergency. They expect the government to do it all, but government relief is slow and unsympathetic. The religious bodies are hampered in their work by native suspicion of Christianity. It is insinuated that there are mutterings of discontent throughout the country and that old and wise British residents are alarmed at the possible results of the withdrawal of the British regiments.

Success of the New Russian Diplomacy.

Russia apparently has gained her poin with Turkey and will receive the railroad concessions in Asia Minor that she asks. Turkey under a threat of war is understood to have declared that in the event of her own failure to construct railways in the Black Sea district she will grant the necessary concessions to Russia. London is plainly relieved at the turn of affairs. The immense Russian armies that have been quietly gathering upon the Turkish and Afghanistan frontiers are now seen to have been put there for the purpose of coercing Turkey, and not England. Nevertheless those armies are to remain in the south indefinitely, and Russian diplomacy is taking advantage of the situation. The acquisition by her of a new naval station on the coast of Corea seems assured. Japan will object to the Russianization of the harbor of Massanpho, but in the end she will probably content herself with a similar concession, without going to war about it. Pavloff, the Russian Minister, has already demanded that Russian subjects only should have the right to work and develop mines, forests and other property in the Corean peninsula. Japan's reply to this was the demand for a concession to work certain Corean gold mines. She will probably continue to demand concession for concession.

The So-Called Paper Trust.

During the past year, the price of paper has risen in the United States to an almost unprecedented degree. The public in general have laid it to the Paper Trust, and have been encouraged in this belief by the newspapers, which have been hit hard by the rise in a staple necessary to their business. There is hardly a large journal in this country which has not lowered the quality of the paper on which it is printed within the year. As a matter of fact, although there is a combination of paper makers known as the International Company, the supposed trust has no absolute control and exercises little influence on the situation. There are hundreds of mills in the country operating independently of the combination, and the officials of the latter claim that they have no intention of trying to freeze out competitors by lowering prices below the profit margin. But, as in nearly every other business, combination of interests has enabled the big concern to manufacture more cheaply and to sell at a profit at a rate below competing firms. The real cause is the advance in prices of raw material. Wood for pulp, rags, chemicals, jute and rope, all extensively used in paper-making, have gone away up, some as high as one hundred per cent and more. A remedy often proposed is the admission of paper to this country duty free, in the hope that it will smash the profits of the "trusts." This, the paper-makers declared, would have an effect precisely opposite. Canada, from which a great amount of our wood and wood pulp for paper comes, is preparing to encourage the manufacture of paper. The Canadian government has already placed a large export duty on these materials, and the opening of our ports to paper would simply help out the Canadians and would cause most of the large mills using wood to move across the border. Besides this, the wood cut for pulp in Canada is owned by the British government and the price for sale is regulated each year by the Dominion authorities. The practical meaning of this is that, should our great factories move across the border, the British government would dictate prices to American consumers. This would hit the newspapers with especial force, since the kind of paper used by them is made from wood pulp. The Canadians admit that the recent reform in export duties was inspired by an intention of discriminating against the United States.

Effort—not Aspiration.

IMMEDIATELY after his arrival in California Mr. C. P. Huntington was asked what he thought of the future of San Francisco. Practically, Mr. Huntington replied, "That will depend upon individual effort in the future." Editor Thompson, a visitor from St. Paul, interviewed upon the same subject, foresaw an exceedingly bright future for San Francisco and predicted a growth unprecedented. Doubtless Mr. Thompson assumed that abiding among her merchants there lived a proper spirit of enterprise adequate to furnish the men and the money to take advantage energetically of each of the thousands of opportunities the future might present. As a matter of course the St. Paul editor would not give voice such to a glowing prophecy concerning a community of sluggards. He would not anticipate wide development in a community where capital was cowardly, where manufacturing enterprise was stagnant, where the blood of mercantile life flowed as sluggishly as the muddy water of a ditch. He meant just what Mr. Huntington meant, and just what The Wave said a few weeks ago, that here was an Empire of Opportunity, that nature had served this state and city with prodigal hand as few localities have been served, and that individual enterprise alone is necessary to bring about a growth and a prosperity that will parallel the unexampled advance of Chicago, the rude city of the West.

"Individual enterprise" is a broad generality—meaningless, perhaps, unless one specify more in detail where such enterprise may be directed safely and profitably. When the Central Pacific Railroad was conceived and constructed, the opportunity to take advantage of the situation was open to all the world. Four Sacramento merchants are responsible for the birth of that great undertaking. After the plan was conceived, stock subscription books were opened in San Francisco, the local capitalist and merchant was given an opportunity to venture his money and share in the profits. The local capitalist was wiser than these country enthusiasts. He laughed the idea down and refused to embark in so hazardous and impossible an undertaking. To form the whole plan of an overland railroad was a wild, impracticable notion. With all of the drumming and soliciting, but one San Franciscan subscribed to the stock. He is described as "a Frenchman, who a few months afterwards was sent to an insane asylum." After the success of the Central Pacific was assured there were still open to local enterprise other proposed or possible lines of railway in the State, but it was left to the four Sacramentans to take advantage of them. There did come a time when the proper spirit seemed to be awakened. A Traffic Association was formed made up of local mercantile houses. It was supposed that the object of this association was to construct rival lines of railroad or encourage and aid such construction by others. The first years of the life of that association were directed, not toward investing their own money in competing lines, but toward securing legislation that would reduce the earning capacity of lines constructed by someone else. Failing in this, the idea of the San Joaquin Valley railroad was launched, as an idea merely. Subscriptions to the road came in with provoking slowness. The whole scheme would have "died a-bornin" had it not been for one man—Claus Spreckels. So it has been throughout the history of the Queen City of the West. Fortissimo in noise but pianissimo on performance.

Within the knowledge of the writer there is a small shipping corporation, controlled largely by residents of the town of Alameda across the bay. This corporation, representing the members of one family, owns interests ranging from one-thirty-second to one-half, in a number of sailing vessels plying between this port and cities along the Coast. The dividends received from these vessels are frequently as high as twenty-five and fifty per cent on the investment. This money represents the earnings on freight brought to and taken from this port. What is done in a small way can be duplicated in a large way. Let a number of merchants come together and form an association for the purpose of investigating and developing seaward commerce. If they hesitate to carry the entire enterprise upon their own shoulders, let them at least undertake the primary expense of establishing the fact that steamship lines between given ports could be made to return dividends; let them make a complete and exhaustive investigation—it will certainly develop profitable lines along neglected and half-worked channels. If after investigating and proving up their case, they lack the courage or the funds to embark in the enterprise, and fail to secure another Huntington or Spreckels, let them advertise the opportunity among some other progressive people, and enlist, if possible, outside capital. The plan to build up a merchants' line of freight steamers, running out of this port to the west coast of South and Central America, is more feasible than was the construction of the overland lines of railway. San Francisco ought of right to be the great coffee distributing point of America. Every pound of coffee raised south should enter here. Our brands and blends should be noted the world over. The trade belongs to us, but some one else now holds it against all the laws of trade. If the owner of sailing vessels mentioned above are netting large rates of interest upon their investments in such smaller craft, does it not suggest that in a wider field and on a larger basis a profitable investment might also be found. But the profit coming to the owners of such lines, while large, is not a circumstance beside the profits that would come to the community itself through opening up new lines of commerce.

Here is a naked suggestion for the exploiting of individual effort. It is only one out of many.

The Negro in Business.

WHILE the negro question does not press heavily upon western America, we have, as Americans, an interest in its proper solution.

The Atlanta University, with a view to discovering methods for improving the economic condition of the negro, has been conducting an investigation of the character and number of occupations taken up by colored men. The result of this investigation has been recently published in a pamphlet entitled "The Negro in Business." The report fairly demonstrates that the negro is gradually moving forward, not only in the trades, but in business. The negro is found engaged in a wide field of pursuits. Among them are butchers, liverymen, bakers, milliners, market gardeners, florists, lumber mill and cotton gin owners, builders, contractors, jewellers, harness dealers, upholsterers, grocers, general merchants, dealers in fuel, fish, furniture and dry-goods, capitalists, bankers, real estate dealers, money lenders, building and loan associations. In manufacturing they are found as proprietors of factories, making shirts, brooms, fans, carpets, rubber goods and cotton mills. In co-operative efforts they are undertakers, druggists, publishers and printers. The sociologists of the Atlanta University have considered these lines of business "in the light of their historic evolution."

The pamphlet says, in this connection:

"It is a well-known fact that the aristocracy of the plantation slaves were the house servants—those who, for appearance, ability and intelligence, were selected from the mass of the slaves to perform household duties at their masters' house. Often such servants were educated and skilful; sometimes they were the natural children of their masters, and at all times they were the class which, when emancipation came, made the first steps toward independent livelihood. The master's valet set up his barber shop in town and soon had a lucrative trade; the cook became proprietor of a small eating stand or restaurant, or, if he was exceptionally efficient and noted for certain dishes, he became a caterer. It was in this way that the famous guild of black caterers arose in Philadelphia. In similar ways, but more slowly, a little saving of capital transformed the driver into the expressman, the coachman into the livery stable keeper, the laundress into the proprietress of a public laundry. The most successful of these ventures hitherto have been those of the barber, the restaurant keeper, the caterer and the expressman."

Under the head of the "capitalist" class various ventures are considered. It is suggested that the mismanagement of the Freedman's bank with its result of ruin to some and heavy loss to many had a tremendous influence against the habit of saving among the colored people. Notwithstanding this, thirty-six capitalists among the negroes have been discovered by the investigators, representing a total investment of three-quarters of a million dollars. Brokers and money-lenders have appeared in cities like Washington, where there is a large salaried class among the negroes, and they do a good business with their own people. Of late years there has been a rapid growth of building and loan associations, which is very gratifying to the friends of the negro. Three of these associations are established in Philadelphia, two in Wilmington, N. C., and one each in Washington, Hampton, Va., Ocala, Fla., Sacramento, Cal., Augusta, Ga., Little Rock, Ark., Portsmouth, Va., and Anderson, S. C. Penny savings banks, it is suggested in the report, would be a great thing for the negro, particularly in the country districts, as teaching him the value of saving his money.

No better advice has ever been given the negro of the South than to keep away from politics. In states where the educational qualification has already practically disfranchised the ignorant blacks, a better feeling is already apparent. In a community where the blacks are largely in the majority political parties naturally become black and white, not Republican or Democratic. The white Republican, for instance, is almost precluded from exercising his choice of party, for he cannot submit to negro domination even though that domination be exercised by black men of his own party. With the negro out of politics in the South there would follow something like a fair division among the whites, and the states lying between Mason and Dixon's line would no longer present a solid political front.

The future of the negro in the South rests with the negro himself. Thrift and economy, coupled with genuine honesty of purpose, will lift the race to a place far above that of the European peasant.

The Coeur d' Alene Investigation.

LAW, the means, and order, the end, are indispensable to assume good government. Condonation of violation, infraction or evasion of law by whomsoever committed is wrong. It puts a premium upon lawlessness. In upholding the law, however, those who are the empowered executors of the law should be careful that in their zeal they do not override the law by perverting its letter and subverting its spirit.

In Washington, D C., there has been conducted during the past ten days a congressional investigation as to the inaugurating and maintaining of martial law in the Coeur d' Alene mining district in Idaho. Sundry witnesses have testified as to the events which immediately preceded and followed the blowing up of the mills of the Sullivan and Bunker Hill mining companies. Of all the evidence adduced, that furnished by Governor Steunenberg was the most valuable. The governor manfully assumed all responsibility for declaring and maintaining martial law in Shoshone county. Had he not appealed to the President, federal troops would not have been sent into Idaho despite the clamor of the mine owners. Apart from consideration as to whether or not Governor Steunenberg was justified in calling for federal aid, he is much to be commended for his candor and honesty in taking upon himself the brunt of the blame for the "bull pen" and the unfortunate conditions resultant therefrom.

The destruction by violence of the mill property by those who had been employes working in those mills, was criminal lawlessness of a most flagrant and dangerous type. It was anarchistic. Every man who was implicated in that crime, whether he be an ignorant foreigner working as a digger in the mines, whether he be a so-called labor leader, or whether he be an official of Shoshone county, if convicted of complicity in that crime he should be made to expiate the deed, to the extreme penalty of the law. Governor Steunenberg's declaration of martial law may have been unduly precipitate. He was, however, best qualified to judge as to its necessity. As chief executive of the State of Idaho he felt that a great and grave responsibility was upon him. The local militia were not available, being in service in the Philippines. The governor had knowledge of the fact, or, had reason for believing, that the sheriff of Shoshone county with his deputies could not be depended on to do their full duty in the premises because of their antagonism toward the mine owners and their local representatives. His only recourse as a measure precautionary was to appeal for federal troops, and to proclaim martial law in the affected district. It may be true, and impossible of justification as alleged by some persons, that innocent men were made the victims of the "bull pen"; but it is unquestionably true that the exigencies of the situation were such that most drastic measures had to be employed in endeavors to apprehend those who were guilty of the lawless acts which had been committed. The governor of Idaho was acting upon Grant's injunction: "Let no guilty man escape!"

In certain quarters much is sought to be made of Governor Steunenberg's denunciation of the so-called labor leaders of the miners' unions of Idaho as criminals, and of their organizations as criminal. The impression is being bruited abroad that the governor's denunciation is shared in and approved by the national administration, and that such denunciation applies to all organized labor. This is a fallacy, and it is designed to influence votes in the coming election. What Governor Steunenberg meant was (as he has since explained), that the miners' unions of Idaho, dominated as they were and are by scheming, self-seeking foreigners, are criminal because they have no respect for law, when they fail of accomplishment of their nefarious ends resorting to processes of intimidation. This was charged against the miners' unions of Idaho, specifically, as was in no sense applied to organized labor generally. It is well known that the unions of the Cœur d' Alene districts are recruited from the roughest, toughest and most desperate characters on the continent. To accomplish a purpose there is no criminal deed they would stop at. They have nothing in common with orderly organizations elsewhere in America.

Governor Steunenberg, President McKinley and all law-respecting, peace-loving American citizens recognize and admit that laboring men of whatsoever crafts are clearly within their rights in combining to protect their interests, but no good citizen will contend that these organizations have any right to use violence to accomplish their ends. And all will unite in holding that whenever and wherever violence is resorted to by these organizations they are culpable before the law, and should be dealt with according to law without fear or favor.

No political considerations should for a moment weigh against meeting out justice to law-breakers, it matters not how potential the individuals, or the organizations with which they are identified, may be at the ballot box. Principles should always have paramountcy over expediency; the right should never give place to wrong. This should govern in the case of the millionaire, as well as in that of the mendicant.

SAN FRANCISCO CEMETERIES.

CREATION AND HISTORY OF THE LAUREL HILL BURIAL GROUND.

UNLESS the late ordinance of the Board of Supervisors proves invalid, four large cemeteries situated within the city and county of San Francisco will be closed for burials after 1901. These four, viz.: Calvary, Laurel Hill, the Masonic and the Odd Fellows', cover an area of about one hundred acres in the Richmond quarter between the city proper and a residence district extending on to the ocean. The old City Cemetary, situated to the west of these four tracts, was closed in 1897. For many years, all interments in San Francisco were made in this district. These burial places form altogether a city of the dead almost equal in inhabitants to the present living population of the town. On the tombstones are the names of the men who have made California—statesmen, pioneers, merchants.

The cemeteries enumerated are all, in a sense, public tracts. In none of them does any profit accrue to the directors, the surplus being utilized for improvements. The Odd Fellows' and Masons are administered on a non-profit basis by the fraternities which own them; Calvary is conducted by the Roman Catholic Church, and Laurel Hill is run by an association which holds it in trust for the city. The question of "steals" or of special privilege franchises, therefore, does not enter into the controversy. The Supervisors ordered the closing ostensibly because it is alleged that interments injure the health of the region, and because the residents of the Richmond district believe that the cemeteries in their midst retard growth in their direction.

Laurel Hill is the oldest, most famous and most beautiful of these burial tracts. It is an outgrowth of the old Lone Mountain Cemetery, opened in 1853. In the beginning, this was a purely commercial institution. Three capitalists, Nathaniel Gray, F. B. Austin and J. H. Atkinson, held a quarter-section including Lone Mountain and a tract to the north and west. The growing city being in need of places for burial, they secured a franchise and opened the tract as a private cemetery. At that time, Lone Mountain was in the open country, practically as far from the town as the cemeteries of San Mateo county are to-day. For fourteen years this place was used for interments, but the city began to grow westward, and an agitation over the matter sprung up. A hot controversy raged during the early sixties. The cemetery was condemned, as to-day, on the ground of health; it was also alleged that the city should own and administer a municipal cemetery and that the private owners were charging exorbitant prices. Besides this, their title to the land was questioned. In 1867, an ordinance was passed prohibiting burials north of California street. In the same year, a body of public-spirited citizens determined to step in, provide a permanent burial-place for San Francisco, and end the controversy. The Laurel Hill Cemetery Association was accordingly incorporated under the Rural Cemetery Act. It was and is a peculiar corporation, resembling one of those British guilds wherein a corporate body within a city, a wheel within a wheel, operates an institution for the benefit of the municipality. Bonds were issued to buy the burial-grounds of the Lone Mountain tract and to purchase the disputedti tle from the city. Only the sixty acres of the Lone Mountain tract bounded by California, Post and Williamson streets and Central avenue, were included in the purchase, the rest being sold by the original owners for building lots. It was provided in the charter that all profits accruing from the sale of lots should be used to pay the interest on these bonds and to furnish a sinking-fund for their cancellation, after which the profits were to be used in improving the grounds. Nine years ago, the original bonded debt of $125,000 was finally discharged, and the profits were at once turned into those improvements which have made Laurel Hill one of the most beautiful burial-places in the whole world.

The incorporation of this company provided a spot where interment could be held within the city without fear of removal, and where families could purchase lots and erect vaults in the expectation of permanence, but it did not end controversy by any means. Laurel Hill was attacked shortly after its foundation in the course of a hot agitation for the maintenance of a city cemetery. It was claimed that only in a burial-ground owned by the city could beauty and harmony be assured. Laurel Hill weathered the storm and the city got its cemetery, but the folly of the contention was proved by the result. The old City Cemetery was always an eyesore, and ran to weeds and ugliness up to the time of its closing two years ago. It stands now, neglected and overgrown, along the track of the Cliff House cars.

The next passage-at-arms occurred a few years ago, when there was an attempt to open Sutter street through the tract. This also failed. Then, in 1896, the Board of Supervisors hit all the city cemeteries by decreeing that no more lots should be sold for interments within the corporate limits. Thus the ordinance prevented burials except to persons who already held family lots. This provision, intended to mitigate the severity of the ordinance, really proved its undoing. The cemetery associations combined and fought the measure through all the courts, winning on the ground that the law discriminated in favor of a class. This brings the controversy up to the latest ordinance.

Laurel Hill has always been closely associated with the history of San Francisco. The great majority of the Argonauts lie under its green slopes. Eleven United States Senators, viz.: Fair, Broderick, Baker, Gwin, Sargent, Stuart, Jones, McDougal, Latham, Hearst and Sharon, are buried there or hold lots in expectation of ultimate burial. Names of leaders in the professions, in commerce, in the arts, in statesmanship, are on the tombstones. The intellectual aristocracy of San Francisco's city of the dead are at Laurel Hill. Some of the monuments and private vaults are beautiful and costly, the investments in this regard running far up into the millions. The Flood mausoleum is valued at $100,000, the Fair, Jones and Patton mausoleums at $50,000 each, and the Nathan vault at $30,000. And the grounds, in the course of gradual improvement, have come to be a beautiful example of artistic landscape gardening. Forty thousand bodies are buried here, and it is estimated that, in the normal course of events, all the lots will have been sold within the next decade, so that, except for occasional interments in family lots and vaults, Laurel Hill will be practically unused by that time.

C. H. Crowell is the present superintendent of the grounds and secretary of the company. A. J. Gunnison and Giles H. Gray are respectively president and vice-president. The present board of directors is composed of W. F. Whittier, J. B. Stetson, R. H. Lloyd, Geo. D. Gray, Geo. Whittell, J. D. Shattuck, Walter Dean, and the president and vice-president.

The Odd Fellows' Cemetery Association was incorporated in 1865, under the Rural Cemetery Act. Like Laurel Hill, it was purchased from persons holding imperfect quatter titles and the city's claim was afterward bought off. Like Laurel Hill, also, no profit is made or expected, the gains, after discharging the bonded indebtedness, going to keep up the grounds. Over twenty-five thousand interments have taken place in this tract of some sixteen acres, and there are not more than one hundred lots left open for burials, outside the unoccupied spaces in family lots. Therefore, interments must cease here, also, in a few years. In this burial-place rest the bodies of nearly all the Odd Fellows who have died in the city during the past thirty years, including, of course, many prominentmen. It is a cemetery noted for its fine monuments, the Piper, Morse and Parker tombs calling for special comment. The tract is not for Odd Fellows alone, however; all sorts and conditions of men being received into the fraternity of the earth.

Ground for the Masonic Cemetery was bought in 1863, and the incorporation took place the following year. The plan is identical with that of the Odd

By BOSWELL Jr.

HERE is an episode of real life that has the flavor of a page of Lafcadio Hearn, or the more recent Adachi Kinnosuke. A Japanese fresh from his home on the other side of the Pacific, arrived in Seattle a few weeks ago. He was accompanied by his wife, a pretty little woman. Force of circumstances compelled the couple to take up their residence in a block which bears a shady reputation. There was no other place for them to go. They were welcomed by their people and soon the husband had procured employment and was earning a good living. Suddenly, however, he discovered that women in the house were endeavoring to persuade his wife to forsake her virtuous ways and follow in their footsteps. She told her husband and he, fearing that she might fall, attempted to kill her. He stabbed her, and believing that he had ended her life, turned the knife on himself. To save her from sin he would see her dead. Neither was fatally wounded, but when they recover they will be taken away from the place of temptation.

The Resignation of Webster Davis.

MY old friend Webster Davis (he spells his name with more "I's" than that when he is talking) has resigned his position as assistant secretary of state, I see, because of his promise to the weeping women of South Africa that he would either get the United States Government to intervene or overthrow it. It looks as if he were going to overthrow it. I am sorry that this is so; for, while the United States Government has its faults, I have become somewhat attached to it, nevertheless. When I last saw Mr. Davis ten years ago at Ann Arbor he explained to me that the country was not run well. I thought nothing of it at the time. It did not occur to me that he would overthrow it.

I knew Mr. Davis—Daniel Webster Davis it was then—when he was a student in the University of Michigan law school. That was in 1887. "Dan" was graduated with the class of '90, the year after my own sheepskin was signed. We used to call him "Buzzy"—I don't quite remember why. Perhaps it was because he tried to get us all out on a strike one day when we had three extra pages in torts to do. I remember he called us "pampered menials" and "slaves" when we laughed at him. He was very much in earnest, however, and for a long time refused to affiliate much with us. I suppose that I knew him as well as anyone in the law school. One night he told me the story of his life. He was born during the civil war, in Pennsylvania—Ebensburgh, I think, but his family emigrated to Missouri after the war. "Dan" became a hardware clerk at any early age. He didn't like the competition, and became a shoemaker, a trade he pursued until twenty-three years of age. He became next a clerk in a grocery store, and then went to Lawrence, Kansas, and helped his mother keep boarders while attending the State University. He tried to practice law at Garden City in 1886, with no success. Then he went to Ann Arbor. After his graduation he went to Kansas City, where he was defeated for Congress within two years. He took up a labor cause with the pork dressers then, and they elected him mayor of the city. That was in 1894. He stumped the district for McKinley in '96, and in '97 became "assistant secretary of state," only seven years out of school. They say that among the thirty or forty "assistant secretaries of state" in the State Department only six are gray haired. None of them are members of the Cabinet, as the Boer newspapers affirm Mr Davis to have been.

A Civil Service Embroglio.

THE Civil service provision of the new charter is liable to prove a source of great inconvenience if proper tact is not used in applying it. The initial examination—it was for copyists—has taken place under the law. There are available for places a large number of young women and a few young men. In the two departments in which copyists are employed, the County Clerk's and the Recorder's offices, there are already in service, appointed since the beginning of the year, the required number of subordinates. They all went up for examination, but few passed. Now the Civil Service Commission demands the dismissal of the unsuccessful employes, and that substitutes be appointed from its list. Recorder Godchaux, while recognizing the sity for civil service, is laboring under an impression that its desirability consists in keeping competent men in place rather than in legislating them out. He refuses point blank to have women in his department. The result is that Mayor Phelan threatens to remove him from office, in which I imagine he will exceed his authority. The departments involved are county offices and in the Constitution of California there is no warrant for civil service such as the charter provides. When amended to allow for the government of municipalities it was only in the matter of the number and salaries of deputies and in the time of election. It is hard to see how civil service can be enforced under these conditions. The result will doubtless be that the question will be submitted for judicial decision, and I am told the conclusion will surely be the elimination of the civil service provision of the charter in so far as it may concern county officials.

University Athletics.

ANNUAL field-day between the two Californian Universities promises at this distance to be as much of a procession as ever—with Berkley, as before, at the brass band end. Stanford's new men have not developed the expectations of the first of the season; there is not a single star wearing the cardinal this winter, although there are several youngsters who give promise for the future. At Berkley, on the other hand, the team is a good one, not up to the standard of the '95 Eastern aggregation, but a lot of consistent performers, with three or four undoubted stars. In the coming meet, California will inevitably win the jumps and weights, although Stanford has just a faint chance in the shot-put. Drum and Cadogan ought to annex the sprints and the quarter for the blue and gold; here, again, Stanford may possibly break in on one event. The hurdles are doubtful; on form, Stanford should again annex the distance runs, her old stronghold. There should be a pretty fight in the pole vault, with the odds in favor of Hoffman of California as against Boyd of Stanford. Berkley will doubtless take the mile walk—an event which has outlived its usefulness, by-the-way. There is no hope of Stanford winning in track this year or any other year until she takes a hand in the general encouragement of track athletics in the preparatory schools. Berkley has done all the work in that line and is reaping the rewards.

In baseball, it is a very even break, there being two rather mediocre teams of erratic tendencies but with strong batteries. The game will be won this year on training pure and simple. It will go to the side which has come nearest observing those rules which are supposed to be necessary to bring athletes into condition. In this respect college baseball on the Pacific Coast has always been lamentably weak. In the East, baseball men are required to train as severely as oarsmen or runners; here, it is made a matter of individual preference. A survival of backwoods athletics prevails in the idea that "You don't have to train for baseball." It is true that the national game does not require the severe physical strain of rowing or track. But lack of physical condition shows itself there in another manner—erratic playing. The men on the two college teams who have made the most errors in this erratic season are the very ones who are notoriously bad trainers. It pays to train; the losing team in the coming series will learn it by experience.

THE familiar array of platitudes were aired at the Manufacturers, and Producers, banquet. The keynote of the oratory was the inevitable expansion by resolution so dear to the San Francisco public man. Irving M. Scott, was, as usual, sensible and intelligent. President Knapp, of the Interstate Commerce Commission, made an excellent address showing clearness and understanding. Dr. Wilson, of the Philadelphia Commercial Museum, was endlessly prosy. M. H. de Young was practical and pointed. Gavin McNab, who is beginning to establish a reputation among business men as one of the brightest speakers in San Francisco, delivered a characteristic talk abounding in epigram. He suggested that the open door meant nothing to an empty hand, that the sea could not bring to the land more than the land brought to the sea, and urged that some of the millions with which the bank vaults of San Francisco were laden be utilized in developing the State's resources.

The Palo Alto Chinese Outrage.

THE Examiner is a living, breathing, howling example of the Aesop fable about the cry of "wolf." We are so accustomed to see that dear defender of our liberties go off at half-cock and denounce every real or fancied evil in sight, that when it does light, quite accidentally, on anything which needs reforming, it fails to arouse much feeling in the intelligent portion of the community. For example, the Monarch of the Dailies is just now howling about the nakedness and want in Porto Rico and the Chinese scandal at Palo Alto. On the face of it, there is no guarantee that either of these crusades have any more substantial basis in fact than had the late bubonic plague scare, or than any other of the weekly phantom crusades of the American Paper for the American People. Porto Rico is several thousand miles away, and there is no telling, although the fact that James Creelman signs most of the dispatches which come over the "special leased wire, etc.," is strong circumstantial evidence as to their falsity. Mr. Creelman has lied so long that it has become second nature. In the Palo Alto matter, it happens that there is a real wrong and a substantial basis for the agitation. But the Examiner will render very little assistance, because it has howled so long and so loud over fake agitations that no one who has the judgment to form independent opinions will take the Examiner seriously.

Thieves in Seattle.

THE expected rush to Cape Nome has attracted an army of criminals to Seattle. They are plying their trade with a good deal of success. Hold-ups are frequent and burglaries and other robberies are an everyday occurrence. In one block not long ago a couple of midnight visitors went through nine houses while the inmates slept. They were very accommodating thieves, for they did not take anything but cash. Other robbers have been known to tear mattresses to pieces, rip up carpets and do other damage in their search for money and valuables. But these gentlemen followed a different system. Their plan was to enter a house, collect all the trousers they found lying around loose, carry them out into the yard, extract all the valuables from them and then place them nicely folded on a neighbor's porch. More than one citizen in Seattle has awakened during the past few weeks to find his trousers missing. The thieves are evidently possessed of a good deal of humor, and shrewdness as well, for they always manage to escape detection. In addition to the professional crooks there must be scores of amateurs recruited from the ranks of the gamblers whose places of business were recently closed. The chief of police has asked for ten more officers, and it is probable that he will get them. It is also probable that the large Eastern and several of the coast cities will be asked to loan Seattle a batch of detectives to aid in weeding out the unwelcome visitors.

TWO mining companies have recently been organized in Washington. If the capital they claim is really in cash, they are in a fair way to become rivals of the great railroads and other corporations. One declares it has one hundred million dollars, and the other announces the modest sum of fifty million dollars. The first company tells its patrons and the public generally that it proposes to reduce ore to vapor and then with a wave of the hand condense the vapor and a shower of silver or gold or copper or some other metal, as the case may be, will follow. The prospectus of the other is equally rosy. It recites that the company owns some fifty claims in one of the greatest camps in Washington, and there are millions in sight. A peculiar feature about these gigantic corporations is that none of their stock is offered for sale in Washington, or if it has been it is not generally known. The East, however, is flooded with their advertisements and they are undoubtedly disposing of a good deal of stock.

A Useless Commercial Museum.

THE Commercial Museum is a favorite subject for the dailies just now. The project is aired every day or for a column or more. I have not learned, however, just what it is proposed to put therein. Is it to be a permanent exhibit of implements and machinery manufactured in the Eastern, States or is it to be devoted to the resources and productions of California? In the latter instance what is the matter with the State Board of Trade's exhibit. Certain agents of great manufacturing interests with $40 a month officers in San Francisco may possibly profit by display of Eastern machinery, cotton and clocks, of which oriental exports now consist, but wherein does that avail California? The one product accepted from the Pacific Coast is flour. Until we begin to make things used in China and Japan, there can be no great improvement. The opportunity does exist to develop trade with the Europeans living in the treaty ports of China, and in the British settlements round the Indian Ocean and in Yokohama, but no commercial museum is required. Half a dozen energetic and intelligent commercial travelers might establish agencies for the wines, the high grade canned fruits and vegetables, the raisins and prunes of California and distinctly increase the exports out of San Francisco. Such goods as canned asparagus, tomatoes, apricots, pears, would find ready acceptance among the British residents of Hong Kong, Shanghai and Yokohama. They drink wine—why not plant the light sauternes, Rieslings and clarets of California. Here is a sensible, practicable line of endeavor which would yield generous returns—not perhaps to-day or to-morrow, but within a twelve month.

A Strong Combine.

THE Shingle Manufacturers' Association of Washington again threatens to close down. This is probably the strongest organization of producers in the United States. Last year they ascertained that certain millmen were cutting prices. They allowed these delinquents to contract to supply an immense number of shingles in the East, then calmly closed down every mill in the state and almost ruined the dealers who had the audacity to go contrary to their pledges. Because of the severe weather along the Atlantic Coast building operations have come to a stop and there is no demand. To continue to produce would mean over production, so a meeting of the association was called hurriedly and a shut down was considered. The idea was to close the mills until building operations might be resumed. However, Rude Boreas has changed his tune in the East and the meeting adjourned for a week without taking any action.

Seattle's Canal.

TITLES to the right of way for the canal from Puget Sound to Lake Washington have been turned over to the United States government and work may be commenced just as soon as Uncle Sam's engineers are ready. A good deal of trouble was experienced over these titles. The government would not accept them until each and everyone had been passed on by the courts. As there were an immense number the process was necessarily tedious. However, everything has been straightened out and there will not be any more delays. Congress has appropriated a sum sufficient to start the work and once begun it will not take long to complete. The canal will be about three miles long. It will run from Salmon Bay just above Seattle into Lake Union, which is within the limits of the city and which itself is large enough and deep enough to give shelter to a good sized navy, and from Lake Union to Lake Washington. An old portage between the two lakes will be made use of. This canal will make Seattle an island.

SAN FRANCISCO CEMETERIES.

Fellows' Cemetery, in that its use is not restricted to the order and no profits are expected. There are about twenty-three acres of ground and over 16,000 bodies interred. Only about an acre and a half remains unoccupied, so that inside of five years this, too, must pass as a place for new burials.

It is practically certain that the four cemetery associations will combine to fight the ordinance. Their opposition, as has already been shown, killed the act of 1896. The Supervisors decided against the cemeteries on the ground of public health. The cemetery men urge that the interment of fresh bodies in their tracts does not injure public health. They declare that the average mortality in the various districts near at hand is only from six to eleven per thousand annually, a rate far below that of the whole city. Moreover, they assert that diseases like malignant fevers caused by decaying matter, are less common in the Richmond district than in any other portion of the city. The Supervisors may close the cemeteries, but they can hardly order the grounds leveled and the bodies removed; while in ten years, at the outside, interments will have ceased almost wholly. They assert that if cemeteries are misplaced in San Francisco county, they are equally so in San Mateo county, where objections are already being made. On legal grounds, the right of persons who have already purchased burial lots to do with those lots as they please will be made the ground of attack, and the first attempt of the city to prevent a burial after August, 1901, will be made a test case.

German students and high school pupils travelling in the various mountain regions of their country now have at their disposal 130 taverns, forty-one of which give them a bed free, while seventy-eight add breakfast, and eleven supper, too. Similar taverns have lately been opened in the Swiss Alps.

THE CHALET RIOND BOSSON,
PADEREWSKI'S HOME IN SWITZERLAND.

PADEREWSKI.

THE CHARMING HOME OF THEPIANOIST IN SWITZERLAND.

IT seldom happens even in this era of culture and high civilization that the monetary rewards of even the most successful artist rival the returns reaped by the business man on commercial ventures. Certain great performers have won fortunes by the exercise of their skill, yet the dimensions of their accumulations would seem but moderate to the able factory manager or the shrewd banker. Nor have the incomes of the cleverest instrumentalists equaled the revenues earned by such eminent singers as Jenny Lind, Patti or the De Retzkes. Liszt, Rubenstein, Bulow and Thalberg attracted large audiences, but their estates proved no serious care to their heirs. Pagannini left a million or more, but to have, with him, was to hold. He might have been a successful huckster if nature had not contorted him into the greatest violinist.

There is one exception to all this—Ignace Paderewski. M. Paderewski has earned an income from his art that might satisfy the financial aspirations of a railroad magnate. Between his tremendous skill and his magnetic personality he attracts extensive audiences at expensive prices, not only in America but also in England and Scotland, in Russia, Germany and France. His last tour of the United States, four years ago, netted him something like a quarter of a million dollars, and I imagine he will have over $300,000 as the result of his present excursion. However, he is conceded to be supreme in his art. Besides being the greatest pianist of the era, he is one of its most interesting personalities. To have heard him play will be one of the treasured memories of the average musician for the next quarter of a century; to have met him, to know him, will be a reminiscence entitled to the attention of the next generation.

When at home Paderewski lives at Morges, Switzerland, where he has a lovely country place on the shores of the Lake of Geneva. From its verdant lawns, or from the windows of his villa, he can look across the shining expanse of blue waters to the snowy Alpine summits crowned by Mont Blanc. Here his vacations are spent; here he composes, entertains his friends, and otherwise enjoys the rewards of his tremendous pianistic labors.

The estate is some sixty acres in extent, and is set out in garden and park, in vineyard and orchard. There are 5.000 cherry trees, from which an excellent brand of Kirsch is distilled. Last year the vineyard yielded 6,000 liters of wine. A vegetable garden extensive enough to supply all the hotels of Lausanne, near by, is another adjunct yet. As a gentleman farmer I am told Paderewski is not a success. He is too deeply wrapped up in his music to have the proper regard for the disposition of his harvests. He is amused and interested in fruit raising and wine making, but they are not subjects of serious concern with him. The most important consideration for the great pianist when at home is composition. He also keeps up his practice, not as he does on tour, when it is usual for him to play eight and ten hours at a stretch, but regular work which preserves the mobility of his hands and keeps him in condition prior to the time he must prepare for the next campaign.

Architecturally the villa has a beautiful effect. The property belonged to a French nobleman, and was purchased by Paderewski some three years ago. It is most commodious, and is charmingly furnished. On the walls hang the mementoes, photographs and curiosities picked up in the brief leisure of his tours. There are seventeen bedrooms, and superb ball and billiard rooms. Here lives Paderewski fils, who amuses himself writing comedies and satires, for which he has a distinct talent. Here the great pianist exercises that hospitality in which his soul delights, and in which his charming and vivid personality finds a second fitting expression.

Paderewski is sui generis. He is delightfully generous, vital, responsive, overflows with sympathy, and will interest himself in anything or anyone but himself and his affairs, to which he seldom alludes. About the man there is not the faintest suggestion of pretension or conceit. Nor is he in the slightest degree affected. The intense adulation of which he is the object has left no impress on his manner or his attitude. To his audiences he gives absolutely his best. To be in the highest physical condition for his work he observes strict rules as to food and exercise. One cannot but think he would have been equally great in aught he undertook. A fine intelligence distinguishes his talk. He has a remarkable memory. There are few subjects in which he is not interested

Paderewski makes his tours in a private car accompanied by his wife and by his manager, Hugo Gorlitz, who has been with him on all his pianistic excursions. There is also a piano tuner, a secretary, a valet and several servants. In the car is a piano, on which the great artist practices continuously, no matter how rough the traveling be. Three concert grand pianos compose the heavy baggage of the party, one of which precedes them in their travels, th others accompanying them in case of accident. A. B.

COLONIALS IN THE TRANSVAAL.

THE NEW ART OF WAR, WHICH THE BRITISH ARE LEARNING. EPISODES AND COMMENTARIES.

THE new art of war is being learned in South Africa in an expensive but effective manner. Certain facts are being borne home to both Generals and subordinates. The chief lesson is the value of individuality in the rank and file and the necessity for accurate marksmanship. The functions of direction must be general rather than specific. Personal leadership is almost out of the question. If an enemy is to be attacked in a selected position his bullets will sweep the terrain over which the attacks must pass with such volume and accuracy that no man can exercise the functions of a director and live. He will be, necessarily, much too conspicuous. It follows that the effective use of the weapon must be left altogether to the individual soldier, and that the profitable expenditure of ammunition must depend upon each man's skill and intelligence.

Herein it is that the colonial and Australian troops have distinguished themselves. They fight just as the Boers do —individually. They shoot as well and have the same characteristic of mobility and personal responsibility. The best commentary on the new irregular soldier comes from Julian Ralph, whose admirably graphic correspondent in Collier's and in the London Mail prove his well earned repute.

The Colonial, he says, is precisely such a man as our Western rough rider? He can worry the Boer day and night. He can slip all over his country, commandeering his cattle, emptying his farmhouses, destroying his grain. He can chase and overtake and vanquish the small commandos of Dutchmen who are forever moving about between one army and another. Did I not tell you that when General Babbington made a raid into the Free State the other day the Australians and Canadians had cleared the way for him and gone twenty miles further in than he did? Well, since then, within a week, one hundred and fifty Boers were chasing some of General French's cavalry when twenty or thirty of Remington's Scouts dashed at them and they turned tail and fled. They know that a European column is practically one man, but that every man in a Colonial column is a separate unit, a fighter on his own account, a thinker for himself, a private and officer combined.

The British are learning this. They began by accepting a little Colonial aid in a very churlish spirit and refusing most of what was offered. To-day they are taking all the Colonial help they can get and the Colonist is uppermost. "Little Bobs" is having a body-guard made up of men from all the Colonial forces, of which there must now be a dozen different bodies in the field.

Debut of the Australians.

"The Australians rode out steadily, and took up their positions with an amount of coolness that startled older soldiers. This was absolutely their first trial on real fighting service, and everybody connected with them was anxious to see how they would comport themselves in the face of the enemy. A body of scouts ran upon a large body of the enemy near Pottsberg Farm, in a deep and shady ravine. The enemy were trying to evade notice, but that was now impossible. In a moment rifles were ringing in the air, and after that first volley the little band of Australians wheeled and galloped for the open country. To have remained there would have meant certain death to every one of the half dozen who comprised the picket, so they did their duty—they fired and rode for the veldt. In a few seconds Boers were dashing out of the kopjes on all sides, trying to cut the small band of Australians off or shoot them down. But the Australians knew their game; they opened out, so that each man was practically riding alone. The Boers could do little with them. Whenever an Australian found himself in a tight place he simply dug his spurs into his horse's flanks, lifted his rifle and blazed into the ranks of the foe. If his horse was shot dead under him he coo-eed to his mates, and kept his rifle busy, and every time the coo-ee rang out over the whispering veldt the Australians turned in their saddles, and, riding as the men from the Southland can ride, they dashed to the rescue, and did not leave a single man in the hands of the enemy."

These colonial troops are the most admired soldiers in the army. They look like American scouts and Rough Riders. To continue from Mr. Ralph's article:

"They ride as our boys do, with the horse, as if each man was a part of his steed. They carry their guns any way they please. They wear their slouch hats as they like: turned up, turned down, or caught up at one side."

Dust on the Veldt.

South Africa is a dirty country to fight in. It is hot, dusty and dry. Says one correspondent:

"The dust which was once a nuisance is now little less than a plague. It is always being stirred—by the strings of horses on their way to watering, which pass and repass to the river almost every hour of the day; by the kicking, squealing droves of transport mules, by the long spans of oxen. It rises on the stillest days, without warning, in thin, twisting spirals of yellow sand, which take their own way, beautiful and abominable, across the camp, befouling everything, upsetting everything that stands across their course, and reaching for hundreds of feet upward into the still blue sky. After the dust—and but a short way after—the flies. One used to think, as a child, that the Egyp ians were let off rather lightly with flies. A short stay by the Modder alters that opinion. The tent is black with them, the jam pots hum under the hand that lifts them from the table, and the flies pour out between one's fingers like black spouts of water."

In the same connection Julian Ralph writes to Collier's:

"The swagger guards and the splendid lancers have already become parts of the dirtiest army in the world. The dirtiest, because there's no such thing as keeping clean. We live in dust, eat dust, drink dust, breathe dust, and dust coats us all from head to foot. Hundreds of one-time dandies have long since ceased to shave, and, until we came to Modder river, a man who washed all over was sure to boast of it and be pointed out to the others. The officers without swords and without stars are as like their men as two peas; in fact we are like an army of dustmen with no differences among us except that Lord Methuen and General Pole-Carew are still as tidy as if they were at home."

Go as you Please Soldiers.

As to costuming, the new conditions are beginning to develope changes of feeling. In his correspondence Julian Ralph alludes to this:

"The other day an officer said to me: 'I wish they'd let our men fight as yours did, in flannel shirts, instead of marching them to battle all harnessed up and weighted down like horses!' Every day I see more and more signs of an approach to reason in this matter. As I walk through the camp I notice more and more men in soft slouch hats. They have lost their helmets in battle or worn them out; but the wonder is that in an old-world army they are allowed to make such a departure. Then, again, I see the engineers and even the men about the guards' camp at work in their shirt sleeves. It is a thing incredible, yet I give my word I've seen hundreds of Tommies working with their coats off. It is said the sword has gone for ever from the field of war. Well, the polished brass and the pipe clay have gone from the British army for the time being, and I shall not wonder if the leather harness drops off Tommy's back before we are through. Some Europeans laugh at us for just such innovations, but we do not laugh back. We applaud, for the changes are brought about by commou sense."

Sunset on the Veldt.

There are compensations even on the veldt. Here is a picture from the pen of H. F. Battersby in the Morning Post of an evening scene on the veldt which is worth reading:

"At evening, from one of those low hills by the river, the scene looks like one of the great fairs of Southern Russia, for in the twilight the veldt has something of the darkness, silence and mystery of the steppe. Its purples are not so deep as those that twilight wears above the black earth of the Volga, but they have clearness and space. The resemblance is strengthened when the floating silvery veil of dust, which seems to rise with the evening, gives to all within it a magic distance—the tents, the tethered horses, the ungainly carts, the orange brightness of the camp fires —while out on the darkening veldt the laboring spans of oxen can only be seen to move by the growing tail of dust behind them. No man could paint that picture and paint into it the sense of war. Even the bugles which cry to each other down there about the fires have no stern hardness in them—no song of death. The thinnest sickle of the new moon burns pale above the hill in the redness which the sun has left, with the evening star set at moon's breadth above it, as in a jeweller's design. The moon rests unbent on its edge before it moves beneath the hill, and, clear as her sinking flame, the little melancholy twitter of the Kaffir phinxes laments the hour. That and not the camp bugle gives the real 'last post,' the night call of this arid country into which we have come."

THE HERO OF PLEVNA.

Passing of Osman Pasha, Turkey's Greatest General.

THE news of the death of Osman Pasha elicited no particular interest in this country. The newspapers gave it a few lines, stating that he was a Turkish general who won fame in the Russo-Turkish war and led the Ottoman forces in the more recent Grecian picnic. No one seemed to be aware that this Turk was the greatest general of this half-century, Von Moltke not excepted, and that, although defeated at Plevna, he gave the Russians such a struggle for supremacy as established his fame among the great figures of Turkish history. Besides this, he was the founder of the modern Turkish army, being responsible for its transformation from a horde of ill-disciplined and ill-equipped barbarians to the excellent fighting-machine of to-day.

Europe first learned of Osman in the heroic defense of Plevna, but Turkey knew him already as the organizer of her army, the man who had brought order out of chaos in her army system. His campaign in the Russian war was managed with such consummate skill that for a long time the Slavonic generals insisted that he was not a Turk, but some European general, possibly the French Marshal Bazaine. He checkmated their every move for a year, and finally, on the banks of the Vid, his little force held 90,000 Russians at bay until starvation conquered him. Twice in the war he was conquered—once at Scalevitz and again in his final stand at Plevna—but under such circumstances that his glory was greater than that of the generals who conquered him.

The defense of Plevna was the height and crown of his military achievement. He had been forced back into that town after a running fight in which the Russians lost more men than the British have lost in the whole Transvaal war. Entrenched in the town, his army successfully resisted every attempt to dislodge them. The Russians were better trained and better armed, yet his own force did not give an inch. Again and again the enemy attacked his outposts by direct assault or by strategy, only to roll back, absolutely cut to pieces. General Todleben, who won his laurels at the battle of Sebastapol, was called in to finish the Turk; he invested the town so closely that it seemed as though not even a mouse could crawl through, and waited for starvation to finish the work. Two days after the investment was completed, the Turk so outmaneuvred his opponents as to slip 5,000 head of cattle through the lines and into his own camp. General Skobeleff telegraphed, a few days later, that Osman was so surrounded as to be unable to hold out a week. Skobeleff telegraphed the same message a month later and again a month after that. The next month, he became less confident and summoned all the available generals and soldiers in Russia to assist in the siege. The Grand Duke Nicholas brought in the pick of the empire's officers and engineers and they laid a scientific siege, but still the garrison held on, as plucky and as full of fight as ever. Each night, the outposts were rushed by the Turks within, who were lashed, by this time, into a frenzy of fanatic zeal. Each day, the Russians rushed and took some of the defences, only to find that these positions were covered by the guns of other entrenchments further within, and were thus veritable death-traps. The time came when General Skobeleff realized that the Turks were letting him take only such positions as Osman chose to let him take, positions directly under the guns of the Moslem defenders. Over 18,000 Russians had fallen before the czar's soldiers managed to invest the town; they kept falling day after day, a thousand or so each week, and still there was no headway made. The cool, strategic generalship of the Turkish leader was blended with a wild fanaticism which he had managed to drive into his men. One and all, they were ready to lay down their lives in exchange for the smallest injury to an enemy. From the picket-lines, the soldiers on either side cursed one another between skirmishes; the Russians could hear coming from the mosques a call to prayers that were maledictions upon the infidels.

In spite of all, provisions ran low in the garrison. Then luck or Allah came to Osman's rescue. A convoy of 10,000 troops with a huge provision-train made a rapid march, an attempt to surprise the Russians and get into the town. In every army there is a coward; the coward in the Russian army was the general who guarded his point of attack. The Russian made a pretence of attacking and then retreated, permitting the provisions to pass within the lines.

It was early autumn when the Turks first occupied the town; it was already winter when Osman answered his government. The armies built huts and camped for a winter siege. Russian spies reported that the Turks were near to starvation, but the generals, remembering the incident of the 5,000 cattle, only watched the closer. Every day brought large skirmishes or small battles. Relief did not come, and when the fanatics died in the camp during their night attacks, they were more ragged and emaciated than before.

At last the crisis came. A spy brought word that Osman's men were gathering on the plains back of the city for a pitched battle. The next morning, Skobeleff swung a wing of his army onto the plain. The Turks were already there, a cloud of skirmishers scouring the ground at their front. The Russian general sent for the remainder of his army; he had scarcely done so, when the fanatic charge of the Turks struck his front. The Russian wing was smashed, crumpled, hurled back. With the issue in doubt, Skobeleff had still time to admire his enemy. "The best-planned sortie I ever heard of," he said; "how I wish that I could have had the honor of commanding it!" The Turk pressed, and encountered the second line of defense, the main body of the Russian army. Here they were checked. The superior artillery, the heavier numbers of the Russians, had their effect, but not before whole battalions had been cut to pieces by the furious onslaught of those wasted, hungry, naked men.

That whole day the battle raged. The Turks caught a Siberian regiment in a redoubt and slaughtered them to the last man. Others hastening to the rescue came into this storm-center, around which the fight now raged the most fiercely. At noon, the Turks were inside the redoubt and on the way to victory, when the Russian forces from the extreme opposite side of the town, who had been marching all day to reach the scene of action, poured into the breach and turned the tide. The worn, hungry, naked Turks fell back; the Russians pressed forward, and the retreat became a rout. By night, Osman had surrendered his force of 45,000, less six thousand killed or wounded.

"If Allah had granted us a full meal this morning," he said, "we would have cut you to pieces."

Failure is the official end of most generals, but not of Osman Pasha, whose defeat was more splendid than a victory. After the war, he held his place at the head of the Turkish army, keeping up the high standard he himself had set. He became the terror and the scourge of the lawless tribes along the border. His was a name of dread among the Cossacks. In these border wars a rumor that Osman Pasha was coming has been enough to make the Balkan barbarians flee for their lives. When the Greek war broke out, two years ago, Osman was an old man and had retired, so that other generals began the fighting. But after the first few actions, when the Greek army threatened Salonica, the Sultan placed the old lion in command again. That swift, short and decisive campaign in which the Greeks were fairly swept off their feet was directed by Osman. This was his last war.

Of Osman personally we know less than we might wish. It is a part of the Sultan's policy to keep the personalities of his head advisers considerably in the background. He was born in 1833, attended the war schools at Constantinople, went into the army, where he rose rapidly, and was fighting practically all his life. English diplomats who have enjoyed the favor of interviews with him have drawn a parallel between his character and that of Wellington. He had undoubtedly the same iron quality, but with a touch of Oriental cruelty which made him utterly regardless of the lives of men. They were pawns in his game. He had, or affected to have, a strong vein of religious fanaticism. It was by playing on their religious feelings that he persuaded his men to hold on and starve at Plevna. His genius lay in a great power of organization, a mighty grasp on situations and that personal quality which is the final and supreme test of a great general.

ROBERT WAGRAM.

LONDON
THREE NEW PLAYS.

LONDON.

THE three new plays of the fortnight are all exceptionally interesting, and for widely different reasons. Mrs. Patrick Campbell is producing "Magda," a new play for her, at Royalty. This statement means nothing unless you happen to be a Londoner and to know that the Royalty is the home of loud and screaming farce. A playhouse lives on clientele as much as on productions, so that the trying of Suderman on this audience was a hazard. It succeeded. The audience followed "Mrs. Pat's" acting with bated breath. I question if an aristocratic, up-town audience would have displayed half the genuine interest. If the bourgeoisie like Suderman, will they not listen to Ibsen and Materlink, I wonder? Will not the revival of the real, genuine drama begin at the bottom and not at the top? It is a question worth considering.

"The Messenger Boy" clothes an humble subject with gorgeous splendor. The play is not much, but the costumes and accessories are a great deal. The humblest chorus girl is gotten up like a duchess. The dresses, mind you, are mainly modern costumes, which come high. It doesn't cost much to dress a play sumptuously in Grecian robes, but when it comes to purchasing the very latest, best productions of the modern modiste, it is different. The women critics in the audience are not authorities on Grecian robes, but they know the points of modern dress.

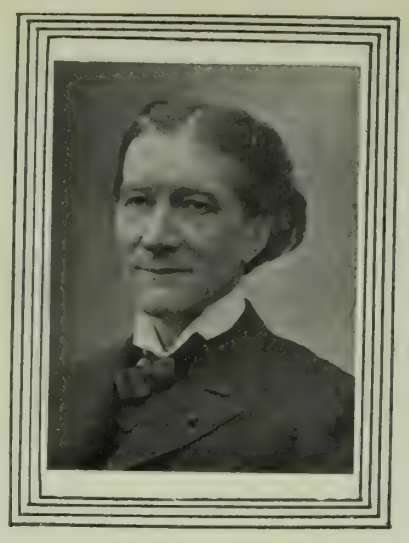
Last of all, there is the revival of a curious old play, written a hundred and sixty years ago and first produced at St. Bartholemew's fair. An excellent new droll, called Don Juan or the Libertine Destroyed, is its title in the old form; Mr. Martin Harvey brings it out as "Don Juan's Last Wager." It is a good play, with the ring of blades in it, and the star's conception of the part is unique, but 'tis nothing special. The interest centers on this revival of a drama which touched hands with the Restoration. By-the-way, Mr. Holbrook Blinn, an ex-San Franciscan, and a Stanford University man, has a strong part, that of an old grandee. It is a new departure for Mr. Blinn, but he puts into the lines a weight, age and dignity which make it a notable role.

It seems like desecrating art to speak of costumes in connection with a play as great as "Magda" and acting as beautiful as Mrs. Campbell's. But some of her gowns must come in for attention. In the first act, there is a long, close evening dress, princesse fashion and made of a gleaming, transparent embroidery of crystal beads on a foundation of corn colored silk (they call it "maize-coloured" in London). A ruche of corn-colored chiffon runs around the bottom. In the last act, her gown is white and gold brocade, veiled with a second skirt of white chiffon. Bodice and overskirt are both of mauve-gray crepe de chine. The overskirt is made of long, square panels caught with silver ornaments a little below the waist-line. A yoke and sleeves of black velvet lattice-work studded with jewels gives the finishing touch. Upon entering, Mrs. Campbell throws off a cloak of emerald green velvet, richly trimmed with chinchilla and a halo-shaped black hat with a half wreath of pink roses.

Among the superb costumes in "The Messenger Boy," I noted especially one of May Hobson's. Over a skirt of mauve-pink panne falls a cream-white silk overdress with silver embroidery. There is a yoke of the pink stuff in the bodice, which is quite simple. There is a cape with this, long behind and short before, of cream lace with an ermine yoke-line. The hat is a floral toque of orchids, matching the skirt in color. The jewels worn with this are magnificent.

It being a sad season for London, there is little change in the modes. Many aristocratic families wear mourning, and the others have scarcely the heart to be over-gay. It must be a black season, with the war still unsettled and the hardest days yet to come. Otherwise, there is a tendency toward simplicity. Soft shades will be favored. Many of the new hats and gowns are to be made of that elusive shade known as "biscuit." I viewed in advance, yesterday, a spring cashmere gown in this tint. The skirt was tucked in horizontal lines from waist to knee with pipings of panne in a like shade. A belt and collar of panne were set off by a chiffon waistcoat, holding medallions of yellowish lace. There was a large toque of biscuit-colored straw, plaited with coarse straw of a deeper shade. The crown was golden-brown in hue; around it was twisted a band of light brown glace silk, veiled with biscuit-colored tulle. Directly in front the two materials were tied in an enormous chou, and the brim was slightly raised at the left by a bandeau of bright blue panne. 'Twas a most delicate and pleasing costume, and sold for a prince's ransom, spite of its simplicity.

In millinery as in dressmaking, the tendency is toward plain simplicity. Hyacinths are to be the favorite flower for millinery, and undyed ostrich feathers are to have some vogue. The natural complement for these feathers is pale blue or the pale-tinted straw of the spring hats. Poppy-red and lemon-colored tulle are also effective. It has been discovered that bright reddish mauve goes very well with "zenda red," the new hair-dye, which is being used with unabashed frankness this season, and women with auburn locks will remember it in their spring millinery. But be careful, if you are going to try it, because it needs an eye for color to tell the exact and precise shade. A hair's-breadth either way, and it is ruined as an effect. KATRIONA.



Victorien Sardou.

PARIS
A VISIT TO SARDOU.

PARIS.

VICTORIEN SARDOU the man is about as different from the people of his plays as one can well imagine. I was granted the favor of a talk with him last week. He did the granting and the talking both. Never in my life was I overwhelmed with such a torrent of conversation. Once or twice I tried to get a word in edgewise. Sardou raised his hand as my mouth opened: "wait a moment, I know what you are going to say," and was off again. He is said to be the champion conversationalist at any distance in all France.

Physically, he is a little, old man of seventy-five, still straight, erect and vigorous. The instantaneous process must be used in taking his photograph, for he is never still. Never have I seen such rapid continuous motion. He gesticulates as he speaks; he stops to adjust his accentric raiment; he uses all the loose articles in his neighborhood to illustrate his points. Indoors, he always wears a white scarf and a student's berri, a cap shaped somewhat like a tam o' shanter. Beneath a fore head and brows of great power, shine a pair of bright eyes, and a face that fairly glows with the energy stored within. It is a face of power, but neither that of an actor nor a litterateur. At first glance, one would probably take him for a statesman or a diplomat.

Mrs. Patrick Campbell, in "Magda."

Never mind what we talked about; it was a matter of business and has nothing to do with the letter. It is the man himself, and his surroundings, which may be of interest. Sardou's house is a modern mansion in the residence part of Paris. He can afford this, for he is very wealthy. Like the greatest of dramatists, he has lived not only for his art but for what it will bring him in the way of profits. He has a strong money sense, and practices small economies. He says, himself, that it is a survival of his old days of struggle, before an accident —Bernhart's notice of his exquisite handwriting— brought him his first move toward fame and fortune. It is said that he saves uncancelled postage stamps! But he keeps the distinction between thrift and stinginess, and being saving, he is also generous. I have heard that the revenue of his American rights is mostly used in an actors' fund of his own for the relief of the needy in the profession. On those same American rights hangs a story. The great dramatist has never been out of France. The thought of a sea-voyage, even to England, fills him with unfeigned terror. Perhaps because of this he has acquired the French habit of thinking that France is the world. And so, when he was approached on the subject of production in the United States, he treated it lightly, as being a matter of small importance. They explained to him the American system of playright's royalties; he shrugged his shoulders. What revenue could he obtain, he asked, from a few productions a year in a barbarian clime? The agent, a woman by the way, thereupon took down a map and explained to him the size of New York, Philadelphia, Boston, and the other great American cities. "Why, 'tis a world!" he exclaimed, and gave permission at once. His revenue from America has been immense ever since; because it was just like "finding money," he has devoted a large part of it to gifts and to charity. Nevertheless he does not like the Americans, partly because we are first cousins to the English, whom he detests with all a Frenchman's hatred, and partly because we are a republic, a form of government which outrages all his principles. There is not in France a more ardent and prejudiced royalist than Sardou. When you think of it, you can trace this influence through his plays. He loves the pomp and parade of royalty, the dignity of aristocratic birth; the finest characters in his works are kings and nobles; the best situations have to do with aristocrats. He even goes so far as to declare that France was at her best before the Revolution. That same Revolution is his special hobby. He is a student of the period, knows it as he knows playwriting. Should he wish to step out of his way to do it, he could write a great history of the period—from a royalist point of view. A mention of the horrors of the bastile explodes him. There were not rats in the bastile, he declares, no wet dungeons, no starvation. It is an open secret that, should monarchy be restored in France, Sardou would receive a patent of nobility.

His method of writing a play is a cold-blooded one. He takes a climax and builds his drama around it. The characters are not even named in the beginning; they are designated simply as A B and C etc. From the climax, he builds the crucial scene; around that, he constructs the rest of the play. Before he puts down a word of his dialogue, the story of the drama is written. Then, when the dialogue is done, the stage-directions are inserted even to plans and descriptions of mechanical devices. Strange to say, he is not swelled up over his work, which is a remarkable thing for an author or actor. He is always open to a suggestion, and changes lines and situations very frequently at the behest of some actor or manager.

His is altogether a warm, genial, pleasant personality—force, leavened and softened by the artistic temperament, kindliness, and magnetism are the qualities which strike the superficial observer. Withal, he is one of the finest gentlemen in France and loved even by his enemies, the red Republicans.

Perfection in Champagne.

The celebrated vintage of 1893 of Moet & Chandon White Seal, now being imported into the United States, is perfection, being the product of the choicest grapes. Its selection by connoisseurs is proof of its high quality.

The man tangled in the tape from the ticker is the type of the average business man. His business cares wrap him about like the coils of a constrictor and slowly crush out his life. The common sign of the business man's slavery is "weak stomach," the natural consequence of the rapid eating, the indigestible pastry, the coffee and pie or doughnuts, with which many a man stuffs his stomach under the name of "quick lunch." The quickest way back to a strong stomach and sound health is to use Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery until perfectly cured. It goes to the root of disease. It removes the cause of ill-health. It makes more blood and better blood, and this blood nourishes every organ in the body to the highest point of vigorous health.

"During the summer and fall of 1896," writes Chas. H. Sergeant, Esq., of Plain City, Madison Co., Ohio. "I became all 'run down,' nerves were out of order. I wrote to Dr. Pierce for advice. He said I had general debility, and advised Doctor Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, and, thanks to you for your advice, I used six bottles; and since I stopped taking it about one year ago, I have not taken any medicine of any kind, and have been able to work every day. My appetite is good, I can eat three square meals a day, and I do not feel that miserable burning in the stomach after eating. My blood and nerves are in good shape, and, I am in good running order."

BABBLINGS OF A BELLE

I AM really alarmed, my dear Diary, at the manner in which the days are passing Here is the beginning of the last month of my Cricket days. Marriage is a most alarming event I think. I wish I could postpone it a little longer. This freedom which. we value so little when it lies like the ocean deep and fathomless before us, becomes very precious when it can be measured by the thimble. I suppose all other girls have felt just as I do now and they always say when they are happily married that there is more freedom in marriage. I wonder shall I! I also wonder whether I really am in love; mama says she used to before she married papa, but of course girls in her period did not understand nor realize life and things as we do to-day. Then there is the divorce court, but mama says it's a terrible state of affairs for an engaged girl to think of such a thing. But,as I say to her, we do think of it and we do speak of it and most of us think it a mighty good thing, for anyone is liable to err in her judgment. It is much better, I think, to separate than live in a constant state of quarreling and ill temper for the sake of the appearance of the thing. Aunt Sybil would say that we girls of the present day are too ready to say "yes" before we had thought the matter over properly. By the way, Aunt Sybil arrived in the Argentine Republic last week. She had a glorious trip down there. I shall miss not having her at my wedding dreadfully—still I know I have her good wishes and that is something. My trousseau is all made and I have not got one grey dress or hat. I should hate to be spotted as a bride. Some friends of ours in the country have lent us their house for a month or so,after the first week I intend having a crowd down to pass the time pleasantly. So many girls say their honeymoon dragged most awfully. I know all the "Ideal's" small talk now; there is not one of his stories that I cannot finish and, I think,tell better than he. In fact, I do not see how he can amuse me for a week, but I shall give him a steady trial. However, just as soon as I begin to be bored I shall telegraph for my friends and then it will be all right. I was asking Beatrice Raoul-Duval the other day was she bored. She shrieked with laughter at the very idea of such a thing and told me the time passed only too quickly. Of course, Raoul is younger than the "Ideal," though he has not had half the experiences and is not nearly so clever. At least that is what I think. Beatrice has her own opinion. Helen Thomas agrees with me that Mr. Kimble and the "Ideal" are the two nicest fellows we have ever known, and are constantly congratulating each other on being so lucky. I wonder shall I enjoy the congratulating a year hence. I promise, Diary dear, to tell you all my trials and tribulations, for you will really be my only outlet. I would not dream of telling either mama or Leila, and as for papa, I could never give him a sad moment, especially as he does not approve of my choosing a man fifteen years older than myself. Still there is Amy Requa Long—I don't know a happier girl than she. In fact her marriage is a synonym now of real happiness.

Several of the girls asked me to tea this last week. I went to Suida Cadwalader's one day, the Hopkins another, then to Caro Crockett's and Emily Hager's. I like Lenten teas, one only has the girls for whom one really cares, and then one can have such a cozy time. There have also been several theatre parties. I was with Harry Stetsons the other evening. We went to see "Mr. Smooth." There were several other parties there. Harry Holbrook had about twelve, and, like ourselves, went to the Palace for supper afterwards. I have never seen the supper room so crowded as it has been this last week. It is getting to be quite infra dig to go to any other place but the Palace. I am so glad, for whatever is cooked there one knows is the best to be had in town. Wednesday afternoon there was a small tournament out at our links at the Presidio. It was a beautiful afternoon and we played for cups, any one of which I should have been proud to own, for they were in exceedingly good taste. Florence Ives gave the tournament and had a number of us to drink tea with her afterwards. Friday I went to hear Paderewski. The house was crowded. A great number of people went, I gathered from the way they showed how bored they were, just to say they had been. I found it very interesting. I do not yet care for him in Chopin, but he is a wonder I think in Beethoven and Liszt. His technique is almost super human.

We had another excellent hunt on Saturday. One sees better riding each week and as more girls take it up, I think in time it will be one of the most delightful of California sports' Mrs. Oxnard gave us a very jolly evening at her new home on Pacific avenue. It is most artistically furnished and I expect we shall have fine times there all the time. Mrs. Oxnard and Mrs. Downey Harvey contrive to give really delightful dinners and luncheons. They are people who have really good cooks and know how to order to best advantage, so give dinners that are certainly worth while. Mrs. Horace Hill is also thoroughly posted on the charm of a well-decorated table. She gave a luncheon last week that was really in excellent taste. The flowers were wild and the foliage was banked around in such a manner as to make one believe they were growing. Mrs. Homer King and Mrs. Pond were the married people, and I really enjoyed myself very much. I expect these next two weeks of Lent will be pretty quiet, owing to their being so near the end, but of course I shall be kept busy. Mayme McMullin Godley has the dearest flat on Pacific avenue. She invited some of us to a reception she gave to meet Miss Wilson of Philadelphia, who is a charming girl, awfully stunning looking, and I think we shall feel we have a good friend in her. I was rather surprised to hear from Catherine Warfield of Fruitvale of her engagement to Lester K. Wells. Catherine is a cousin of the Duperus and a beautiful brunette. She is not yet twenty, so of course I do not quite approve of her marrying so young. They are to be wedded on the 24th of April, just six days before mine. Now, Diary dear, I think I've told you all the news of this week.

MISS CRICKETT.

An agreeable reminder of the festivities connected with the return of the California volunteers was received recently by J. B Boland, of Sievers & Boland,the well-known florists. Mr. Boland, who is very popular among the numerous members of the floral guild, especially assisted in the matter of decorating the streets of San Francisco for the great occasion and succeeded in working up the enthusiasm of the other florists to such a degree that they all got in and helped valorously, contributing palms, shrubs and flowers in profusion. The ample funds which the committee collected rendered it easy to re-imburse all who had assisted and the compliment was returned in cash. Mr. Boland, however, refused to receive any remuneration, as he had worked for the good of the cause, and not for metallic return. Mr. A. Schilling, who had charge of the decorations on behalf of the committee of arrangements, was very appreciative of Mr. Boland's assistance, and presented him, recently, with a beautiful cut-glass and silver vase, suitably engraved.

OAKLAND CHOIRS.

The Singers who Make the Music in the City of Churches.

OAKLAND is not dubbed "The City of Churches" without good reason. In proportion to population its sacred edifices are more numerous than those of the sister city, and, what is more, are more commodious. Indeed, religion is popular in the Athens of the Pacific—how much is due to the pastors and how much to the music is too delicate a question for decision here. Something may be deduced from the fact that on great occasions, when the music is specially advertised, the crowds cannot find accommodation. Whether they are present for harmony or for virtuous instruction is for some wiser pen to tell. Nor shall I here venture a decision of that delicate point—in which Oakland church may one hear the best music? When all are so good, why draw delicate distinctions? Besides, excellence is largely a question of the ability of individual soloists, so in dealing with the subject it must be on the basis of singers rather than choirs.

The first to mention should be Mrs. Martin Schultz, who has been singing for eighteen years in California. Her career began as a choir singer when she was but fifteen. Since then she has sung East and West, in San Francisco at the First Congregational, in New York at the Fifth Avenue Baptist; but she is now at the First Congregational, in the City of Churches, and if the congregation is to be considered, will remain there. Mrs. Carroll Nicholson is also a soloist at the First Congregational Church, and possesses a very useful and full contralto voice. She has sung for several years in Oakland churches and has also been heard in San Francisco. Some of Mrs. Nicholson's best work was that in connection with the San Francisco quartette. Her fellow members were Willis Bachelder, Miss Millie Flynn, and Thomas Rickard.

Mrs. Carrie Brown Dexter, a pupil of D. P. Hughes, has made her reputation entirely within Oakland. She has a fine, rich soprano voice of good range, which is heard in solo in the First Presbyterian Church. This singer has been heard in many of the concerts of the Orpheus, Hughes and Loring Clubs on both sides of the bay. Another Oakland girl who is now winning laurels in the East is Mrs. Beatrice Priest-Fine. Her education was obtained in the city of churches. She was long a distinguished member of the First Congregational choir. Mrs. Fine is now starring in concert in the East, but her permanent home is still in Oakland.

Since 1879 Mrs. A. A. Dewing has been a familiar name in the church choirs of Oakland. At present she is soprano soloist in the First M. E. Church, and has held that position for nearly five years. She was for several years soloist for the Howard Street Church in San Francisco when Rev. Dr. McKenzie was pastor. In Oakland Mrs. Dewing has also been engaged in the choirs of the Church of the Advent and the First Presbyterian Church. She began her career as soloist at the First Congregational. She is the daughter of the late Dr. S. H. Melvin, one of the men who laid the foundation of Oakland many years ago. A young woman whose voice is fast bringing her into prominence is Miss Susan E. Etelka, daughter of Mrs. Martin Schultz. Although not [illegible] teen Miss Etelka has had her voice tested by some of the masters of song of this country, who have pronounced it to be one of great promise. Though her voice has been excellently trained she has not yet made her debut outside of the church where her mother sings. Mrs. Langdon, who as Miss Mary Sullivan was well known years ago in choir circles, is an effective soloist. She has sung in several churches in Oakland. For two years she was with the First Presbyterian, and latterly she has been soloist at the Church of St. Francis de Sales, only leaving that position at the beginning of this year. Mrs. Langdon is thoroughly an Oaklander, her musical education having been had from her mother, who is the widow of the late General Sullivan, U. S. A.

Mrs. Caulderwood, a high soprano, is at present soloist at the Church of St. Francis de Sales. For some years she has been studying under Professor Kern, and has lately made her debut upon the dramatic stage. She can reach with her voice D flat above high C. Her solos are among the features of the service at St. Francis. It is not unlikely that Mrs. Caulderwood will soon forsake church singing for the stage.

Another ambitious young vocalist is Grace Irene Thomas, who is now solo soprano at Sacred Heart Church. Like so many other Oakland songstresses, Miss Thomas has not confined herself to one church, but has sung in many choir lofts. She has been connected for five years past with the First Congregational Church, but has also sung solos at the Brooklyn Presbyterian. She proposes soon to go to New York to develop her voice, further with the idea of entering upon a concert or operatic career.

But Oakland has many other vocalists engaged in her choirs. Among the others may be mentioned Miss Mabel Gray, the contralto of the First Methodist Church; Miss Helen Vockel, an alto who is heard sometimes at the German Lutheran Church and oftener at the Brooklyn Presbyterian in East Oakland. Mrs. Ruth Sunderland, better known as Miss Birdie Pugh, is the soloist for the Sunday school at the Tenth Avenue Baptist Church; and Miss Ada Bibby, the elocutionist, is also heard in the same choir. Miss Bessie McCord, of the Christian Endeavor chorus, is also a member of the same church. Other church singers who are prominent in Christian Endeavor circles are Miss Julia Frazier and Miss Edith

THE GOLDEN HORSESHOE.

STEPHEN BONSAL, who achieved some notoriety during the Santiago campaign by reason of his disputes with the general commanding the American forces, has been doing some very good work of late as a descriptive writer. The Golden Horseshoe is his latest book. The account purports to be a correspondence between two officers of the army, one of whom after the war goes to Porto Rico, the other to Manila on the Sherman from New York. Mr. Bonsal is supposed to be the editor of these letters. The Sherman, it will be remembered, touched at the chief British ports on her long voyage and won unlimited praise as a model troopship. While the British officers were examining her and entertaining her men, Mr. Bonsal seems to have been investigating the effect ence of the superimposed British civilization upon the various Oriental life. He ends by admitting that it has been almost miraculously good.

I shall have space to quote briefly from this interesting book. Malta and Suez and Ceylon and Siam are hundreds of thousands of miles away from America. Let us instead have a description of our new next-door neighbor—Hong-Kong. The men on the Sherman have just been told that the great rock straight ahead of them is the third port in the world:

"One by one the wonders of the place came into clearer view. Soon we saw that this little island, unlike the other worthless shoals or shafts of rock that rose out of the sea, was hedged about with granite docks and walls. The island itself, as it rose to a peak that was lost to view in the clouds, was honeycombed with roads and streets, and dotted with palatial hongs and dwellings. Looking like ants in the distance, we caught sight of thousands of workmen swarming up the mountain side and down upon the docks to their daily tasks.

"We should have been in a measure prepared for the miracle that now grew plain before us, by what we had seen in Colombo and Singapore, and yet after all the first view of the imperial city of the East came with the overpowering force of a surprise. Why, the water-front of New York looks like a fishing village in comparison with this city of the East. We could hear the creaking of the derricks on the docks, and the roar of the blasting charges in the quarries. Men were rushing about all over the place as if time was really an object. We rubbed our eyes hard and wondered how it had happened that in a moment we had passed from out the lazy, slippered East and were back again in the wide-awake world of men who earn their daily bread by the sweat of their brows. Dozens of great ocean steamers went past us, whipping in and out of the channel like the big fish they are, and suddenly, above the tooting of the whistles and the general uproar, we heard an ear-splitting English cheer. We were passing a great battleship that is standing guard over this vast workship and market of the East.

"When we climbed out on the landing stage we gave our boatman a shilling apiece. Seeing, I suppose, that we were 'easy,' he asked for another shilling, and we were about to hand it over—certainly it did not seem too much—when suddenly there sprang up out of the bowels of the earth a Sikh policeman armed with a stout truncheon. Taking in the situation at once, he gave the China boy several raps with his club, the boy squealed like a stuck pig, and we got all our money back, and I am afraid in the hurry and excitement a little more besides. Profuse apologies, in a strange, guttural language, were offered us by the Sikh, and assurances were given and accepted that it would never occur again. We were assured that the license of the boy to ply for hire in the harbor of Victoria would be canceled, or at all events suspended for at least six months. As we wandered on, we could not help comparing the shameful way in which our 'dough-boys' were robbed in the harbor of New York."

And now for a description of British sanitary activity. The ancient Portuguese city of Macoa is not far distant from Hong Kong. Mr. Bonsal visits it, in company with his friend Burton, of England. Everyone seems asleep. In the lower section of the city, however, dense clouds of smoke are arising.

"'Down there,' said Burton, 'is the dirtiest place in the whole sink. Even the Chinese are deserting it, and our fellows have come over from Hong Kong to clean it up. You see it is a terrible bore for the Hong Kong people to have Macoa and Canton so close. I believe Hong Kong would have as clean a bill of health as Liverpool or Glasgow if it were not for the half-breeds and pigeon-boys from Macoa, and the yellow-boys from Canton, who come sneaking over to our colony in sampans loaded down with bundles of infected rags; and then, of course, however well we keep our rock swabbed down, the plague blazes out again. Latterly our fellows have come to the conclusion that the only way to keep Hong Kong clean is to scrub up our neighbors, as well as our own island; and down there you see they are at it.'

"Very much pleased that we should take an interest in the work, Burton at our request led the way down the steep descent to the burning slums. At the bottom we were confronted by a high barricade, with but a single narrow opening, in which a Sikh sentinel from one of the Hong Kong regiments stood guard. For some moments indeed it looked as though our curiosity would have to go unsatisfied, when suddenly another man appeared on the scene. I do not think I ever had an exact idea of the mud-larkers of the Thames, of whom we read so much in Dickens, until I caught sight of this figure. He wore a pair of yellow drill overalls rolled up to the thigh, and was stripped naked to the waist, with the exception of a cholera belt.

"'Hello, Burton,' he shouted, catching sight of our guide; 'we are doing a little white-washing. Want to have a look around?'

"And upon a word from him the Sikh drew back and we passed behind the barrier and down the street, picking our way through the rubbish and debris, Burton's remarkable-looking friend leading the way with a pleasant grin upon his face, and carrying his pail of disinfectant, which he sprinkled about with a broom as though born to the job.

"'That's Kennedy, the best polo player in the Lancers,' whispered Burton with considerable awe, as we pressed on after the cheerful mud-larker.

"While we picked our way along through the smoking debris and the smouldering ruins, and the tarpaulins stretched out here and there, which at once covered and plainly revealed the outlines of the bodies that lay underneath awaiting the burial cart, Kennedy rattled along, telling Burton how he and Fassett and Hearn and Mitchell-Innis had been dying for something to do, and how they had wheedled the English governor into lending them twenty Sikhs from the Hong Kong regiment, and how they had at last secured his blessing and carte blanche to go ahead and clean up the Portuguese colony.

"'But when we got here,' Kennedy ran on, 'we found that twenty men could not begin to do the business, so we put our heads and our pockets together, and the result was sixty quid and a determination to have our fun even if we had to pay for it—and a fellow generally has to do that, you know, first or last; so we hired a lot of Mozambique niggers from the Royal Macoa Guard at six-pence a day. You should have seen their mouths water at the sight of silver. We rather think that with our sixty quid we will pull off the trick and have enough left to pay for a dinner to celebrate our return to the Peak.'

"I could not get over my surprise at the way these English officers were making themselves at home within Portuguese jurisdiction, and at last I asked Kennedy how in the world he had succeeded in getting permission to do pretty much as he pleased.

"'Oh, well, to tell you the truth we didn't; we didn't even dare to ask for it. We haven't got authority to tear down and burn up; we have only permission to use the hose.' Then he continued in a confidential tone: 'You see we didn't want to embarrass the Portuguese government, so we pitched right in and said nothing. If we had, you see, Don Christoforo would have fussed about for a week or two, consulting the Leal Senado, and then cabled home for instructions, and the answer might just as well have been no as yes; so we concluded we would go right ahead and do the trick, and we rather expect to be through and washed up and back home again before the Dons catch on to what we have been about.'"

The Golden Horseshoe is published by the Macmillan Company, New York. The book demonstrates its author to have an eye for good copy at least. In literary style it is not unique among books of its kind; but the matter is always interesting; and that is more than most of the books of its kind can say. As to its truthfulness, that can best be judged by those who have seen a great deal of the East.

NEW BOOKS.

The Colossus, by Morley Roberts, was probably written for British consumption, rather than American, as its interest consists chiefly in its characterization of Cecil Rhodes of South Africa, who is in a way its hero. The scene of the tale is laid in Egypt, where Rhodes is at work upon his railroad scheme. There is a fair and wealthy Britisher in the story, who is ambitious to become Mrs. Rhodes. She can not seem to make any impression upon his stony heart, however. Rhodes finds himself blocked by the French, at the end of some one hundred and fifty pages. The fair Miss Gertrude hears of it and determines to show the Colossus that she is more of a woman than he thought her. So she sets to work to get certain officials within her power and break the blockade. A rather reckless intrigue with the notorious Zohrab and the thing is accomplished. Rhodes in the end avails himself of the power of this woman over his opponents, but instead of asking her to become his second self, with much consideration he tells her that what she desires can never be, since he does not love her. Whereupon she, not altogether broken-hearted, gives him up.

As is customary in the British cosmopolitan novel, our old friend the itinerant American is made use of, just to show the author's familiarity with his western cousins. And he talks like this:

"'Well, he's just a devil of a thinker. However, I've seen him, and that's somethin'. What do you reckon he's studying on, young man?'

"The 'young man's' eyes gleamed for a moment.

"'I shouldn't like to say,' he remarked good-humoredly.

"'I honor you for it,' said the American, nodding; 'but I'd lay my last red it's railroads. All aboard for the Cape is Loder's motto, or I'm a Dutchman. Good-day, young man. Do you feel like a liquor?'"

For which Bret Harte cannot wholly be held responsible. The book is published in this country by Harper & Bros., New York.

I have before me a sort of phonographic record of sounds (including speech) in a tenement, under the name of Poor People: a Novel. One I. K. Friedman is the author. He is not a newspaper man, else he would know copy when he saw it. And he is not a realist, for all his machinery of phonograph and kodak. Literature is not altogether a matter of shorthand, it would seem.

Mr. Friedman's book purports to be a study in detail of tenement sorrows, tenement joys, ambitions, weaknesses, hopes, loves. It purports to be absolute verity. It purports to give a record of conversations just as they actually occurred between the characters. Probably it is veracious enough in this respect. Nothing is easier than to carry on a dialogue in the south of Market manner.

"You mustn't get angry, miss."
"I am not angry, mister."
"Well?"
"You don't seem a bit pleased to see me."
"I'm delighted."
"No, you're not; you don't look it."
"I'm frightfully busy."
"You ought never to be too busy to see me for a few minutes."
"I never am."

And so on; stupid, purposeless conversation, but absolutely true to the gas belt in which the well is sunk. Blue milk and chicory coffee o' mornings are not especially interesting in themselves; yet people really use them. In addition to this gas and blue milk, Mr. Friedman indulges in the more showy platitudes of sentiment, and in those peculiar gilt plaster-paris figures dear to "fine writing."

"No celestial anodyne will the tenement pour from the vials of truth to ease the souls tormented by profitless pondering over the inequality of opportunity and the injustice of distribution. Over the entrance methinks I see, blazoned with the blood of broken hearts, the inscription, 'Abandon all hope ye who enter here.' Laughter, loving us not, seeks lighter dispositions for permanent home; sorrow squats at the threshold snarling and snaping at misery, want and woe, covetous of its coign. Often have I thought of the tenement as a mine, dark, dank and gloomy; its walls and floors wet with the oozing of human tears; its tortuous halls and small chambers countless winding dismally through the bowels of the earth. Angel of Charity and Mercy, descend with thy shining lamp, hold thy cheering light aloft and let its rays surround me, lest I grow faint of heart in the darkness and cease my labor before I have unearthed the gold which I seek."

It need only be added that the author deals out his poetic justice at the end to everyone within reach of his inkwell; the virtuous oppressed are made happy, the proud humbled to the dust; so that we may regard the tenement problem as settled. Published by Houghton, Mifflin & Co.

There is more Catarrh in this section of the country than all other diseases put together, and until the last few years was supposed to be incurable. For a great many years doctors pronounced it a local disease, and prescribed local remedies, and by constantly failing to cure with local treatment, pronounced it incurable. Science has proven catarrh to be a constitutional disease, and, therefore, requires constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure, manufactured by F. J. Cheney & Co., Toledo, Ohio, is the only constitutional cure on the market. It is taken internally in doses from 10 drops to a teaspoonful. It acts directly on the blood and mucous surfaces of the system. They offer one hundred dollars for any case it fails to cure. Send for circulars and testimonials. Address,

A MILLINERY CENSOR.

"A woman is absolutely helpless when she goes out alone to buy a hat!" exclaimed Mrs. Dobley, and Mr. Dobley sighed inwardly, for he knew that this meant that Mrs. Dobley contemplated another millinery purchase, and he had grown to dread these happenings as pecuniary catastrophes.

"It doesn't matter a mite if there is nothing in the shop that looks well on one or not," she continued; "they'll sell you something or other."

"There are times," said Dobley thoughtfully, "when a man finds that he has bought a gray Alpine with a bandanna band simply because the clerk had told him that the Prince is wearing one at Homburg."

"But they don't dazzle you with stage effects, do they? At an up-to-date milliner's it is just ike a matinee."

"Do they throw a calcium on you and play slow music, or what?" asked Dobley.

"Almost," said Mrs. Dobley. "They have little rooms all padded with satin in pink and blue and red and yellow, to suit different complexions, you know. Then there are lots of mirrors that show your head in so many different ways. They turn on an electric light and fluff up your hair and give you some sort of cordial in a little cut glass. Some day a milliner will start a place with an art censor in attendance who will give one a perfectly just opinion on the fitness of a hat for an individual customer."

"I can see that milliner's failure in a week," said Mr. Dobley. "A woman would set her heart on one special hat and the censor wouldn't approve. The customer would never go there again. Don't I know the way you act when I criticise anything you buy."

"That's because you never tell the truth about the things," said Mrs. Dobley with reproach. "You just try to say something funny that won't express any opinion at all."

"My dear I always hesitate to provoke a discussion which will result only in your doing exactly as you please in the matter. When I tell you I disapprove of anything you wear, you say I would prefer you to look like a freak."

"Men are always admiring things on other women that they don't want their own wives to wear!" said Mrs. Dobley. "Just as though I shouldn't much prefer you to give me a frank decision."

"Very well, Mrs. Dobley; hereafter I shall give you a fair verdict. But if our happy home is broken up you must remember that I have always preferred to evade forcing my particular ideas, of what you should wear. I should hate to have to wear neckties, waistcoats and socks that you might pick out. Women always like neat wall paper patterns and chaste oilcloth designs for men's wear. Hereafter I shall act as censor, by request."

"Then come with me this morning to Mme. Jollyer's," said Mrs. Dobley, "and help me pick out a hat."

An hour later they were in Mme. Jollyer's shop. The proprietress and her assistants fairly beamed. When a customer is escorted by masculinity it usually means a large and quick sale, owing to the man's desire to appear generous and his longing to get out.

But Dobley had a gleam in his eye that meant a terrible resolution to do his duty or die. For the first time he gazed upon the electric-lit satin-padded cabinets that his wife had told him of. He entered one with Mrs. Dobley and was put in a chair at one side, from which vantage point he experienced a sensation of stage fright when he first saw himself in the mirrored walls from so many points of view.

Mme. Jollyer opened a pleasant conversation upon the new styles from Paris with Mrs. Dobley while Dobley contemplated the point at which the base of his brain leaned upon the top of his collar for the first time in his life. Then the saleswoman came up with several hats poised like birds or floral bunches on her hands and arms. She placed them daintily upon the chairs and made her exit while the reflections of the hats in the mirrors produced the effect of a kaleidoscope on Dobley's mind. He began to get dizzy.

Mme. Jollyer perched a small, jaunty-looking yellow straw with a chiffon scarf and a long-tailed bird upon Mrs. Dobley's head. Then she gave it a slight tilt over the eyebrow.

"Very sheek," she said; "too sheek for anything. You'll see nothing like it in New York this spring."

"Only one of the brood?" asked Dobley.

"I beg pardon?" said Mme. Jollyer, while Mrs. Dobley frowned several times from the walls at her husband, in an endeavor to make him desist from his usual mode of conversation.

"I'm referring to the tit-willow," said Dobley. "I am something of a sportsman and am interested in the different breeds of—"

"Do you think it is becoming?" asked Mrs. Dobley, with another warning glance.

"The aigrette," said Mme. Jollyer, "is an exquisite thing—quite the finest that I have had sent over."

"Did it die in captivity?" asked Dobley; "or was it shot while on the wing or bringing a bird-seed lunch to its young in the nest?"

"I don't quite understand," said Mme. Jollyer, frowning somewhat in a questioning way.

"Mr. Dobley," explained that gentleman's wife hastily, "is opposed to birds on hats." He prefers them on toast, like most men."

"Suppose," said Mme. Jollyer as she removed the tit-willow hat, "that you try this little rose toque. It is made entirely of crushed roses of varying shades of pink, and has every stage of the flower from the tiny little green buds to these full open blossoms. It is a gem!"

She pinned it on Mrs. Dobley's hair and that lady smiled at her reflection in the mirror. "It certainly is charming—if it is not too young?"

"How old is it?" asked Dobley.

"I mean too young for me!" said Mrs. Dobley. "It's a beautiful thing, but I am afraid it's just a little youthful for me?"

"Oh, pshaw!" said Dobley. "Nobody knows your real age but me and I'll never dare to tell. With a little care and constant face massage you can manage for a while longer."

Mrs. Dobley laughed in an irritated way, but Mme. Jollyer glared at Dobley as though he had gone out of his senses. Evidently she had no sense of humor. Besides he was hurting her chance of making a sale.

"It just suits your face!" she said to Mrs. Dobley. "That creamy olive complexion always goes with pink!"

"What do you think about it, Mr. Dobley?" asked Mrs. Dobley, with a coquettish glance at her husband.

"I think it has a 'Come-into-the-Garden-Maud,' look," said Dobley. "Looks like something a serio-comic would have on when she tripped out to sing: 'Father's Out of Work Again,' or 'Gathering Up the Hayseeds by the Sea,' or—"

"What on earth do you mean?" asked Mme. Jollyer, forgetting her professional courtesy.

"Looks as though it were for stage wear!" said Dobley.

"It is for carriage wear!" said Mme. Jollyer haughtily. "I am not showing Mrs. Dobley walking hats."

"Mr. Dobley means for the stage in the theatre," explained Mrs. Dobley; "but it is a darling of a thing."

"I recollect once buying a mink hat," said Dobley, thoughtfully, "with a passementerie plume and swiss wings with velours. It fairly fascinated me at first—I wasn't happy till I got it—but then it began to pall upon me. I hated it—I loathed it. It represented all that I desired least on earth. It was a perfect Sapho of a hat—"

"How much is this hat?" asked Mrs. Dobley, seeing Mme. Jollyer's horrified face.

"Thirty-eight dollars," said Mme. Jollyer. "Then there is a little collaret that goes with it which brings it to fifty—the complete set."

"'And the—boy—guessed right the very first time!'" sang Mr. Dobley, sotto voice.

"Do you think it's too much?" asked Mrs. Dobley anxiously.

"A mere bagatelle!" said Dobley, waiving his hand in the air. "Why don't you get a hat that is worth while! I hate a woman in a dowdy hat!"

Mme. Jollyer, taking Dobley's remarks in earnest, hastily took up a big black lace hat with ostrich pompons and jet buckles and placed it athwart Mrs. Dobley's brow.

"Now this is a hat!" said Dobley enthusiastically. "I have always wondered why women in choosing hats were content with getting them in such small quantity. A wisp of lace and a few measly buds, or an undergrown feather. They pay $40 for a thing like that and spike it to their heads and are happy. But that hat you have there represents value. You have weight—"

"It is heavy!" said Mrs. Dobley doubtfully, as though she suspected his sincerity.

"You have a certain area covered in material, a solid mass of value received. Even though a hat of that sort might not seem as attractive you can always look at it and say: 'At least I have forty dollars worth of a hat, such as it is.'"

"This hat is $100," said Mme. Jollyer. "It is real lace!"

"I knew it was the real thing the minute I set eyes on it," said Mr. Dobley. "All one would need with a hat like that is a pair of boots and a sword to look as though he had stepped out of an opera. I declare, Mrs. Dobley, if you do not purchase the hat I think of getting it myself."

Madame Jollyer went off to get more hats. Her eyes had grown glassy looking at Dobley, who seemed to be thoroughly enjoying himself. Mrs. Dobley wore a troubled look.

"I declare," she said, "you are not helping me a bit! You are making it even worse than usual, this trying ordeal of buying a hat."

"At least," said Dobley impressively, "you haven't bought a stuffed, dyed cat with a rose in its mouth. Give me credit for saving you from the tit-willow on the bough and the dead-march hat with the plumes. I am beginning to feel, Mrs. Dobley, that I am cut out for the role of a millinery missionary. Mme. Jollyer, having failed to hypnotize you into buying of these good sellers will now delve into safety deposit vaults for something choice tempting. Hist! Here she comes!"

Madame Jollyer appeared with three hats. Her manner was a mixture of keen reproach and regret.

"This I see is a new vintage," said Dobley. "I am referring to the hat with the grape clusters upon it. I like a nice fruity hat better than any other sort. A grape or two with a banana and a few cherries. Could anything be more alluring on a woman's head?"

"I prefer that hat with the violets," said Mrs. Dobley, putting it on with a thoroughly satisfied air. "I always did like violets. What do you think of this?"

"That hat," said Dobley, with a critically half closed eye, "is what I would call a 'peach.'"

"I'll take it," said Mrs. Dobley decisively.

"Have two!" said Dobley. "You like this hat, so get enough of it and you won't have to get another for a long, long time! Be a philosopher. Condense your sorrows and multiply your joys by a simple system of buying enough of a hat you like when you have the opportunity."

"We never duplicate our hats," said Mme. Jollyer, coldly. "Even those which we make up here in the shop. This, you know, is not an imported hat."

"Oh, horror!" said Dobley. "What have we done? Picked out an American hat? Oh, la—la—la—la—!"

"I don't care," said Mrs. Dobley. "I like it!"

"It's a nice little hat," said Mme. Jollyer, without much emotion; "a simple little thing!"

"It is true it hasn't that hearse effect that the black hat has—nor the 'Come-Birdie-Come' expression of the other—but just for an ordinary-unanimous hat—"

"How much is it?" said Mrs. Dobley.

"Eighteen-fifty," said Mme. Jollyer.

"Oh, listen to the band," sang Mr. Dobley joyfully, as he dived into his pocket. "No family is complete without a millinery censor."

"Well, it's a sweet little hat," said Mrs. Dobley, as she prepared to go.

"It is a hat in a thousand," said Dobley.

"And so long as we picked out such a low priced one—why—"

"Yes?" said Dobley, apprehensively.

"You can take me to luncheon."

"Done," said Dobley.

CHORUS SINGERS.

Beckman, who was the secretary of the executive committee of the big State Christian Endeavor Convention that met in Oakland last year.

Among the choirmasters of Oakland are several musicians whose reputations have extended throughout the West. Among them may be mentioned A. M. Benham who until recently was leader of the choir at the First Congregational Church. He is a good musician and under his direction the choir was developed into one of the finest in California. Mr. Benham was chosen to lead the great Christian Endeavor chorus of many hundreds of voices that gave the famous concert in the Mechanics' Pavilion at the time of the international convention of Endeavorers three years ago. J. M. Robinson, a a good basso, is choirmaster at the First M. E. Church. He directs forty voices there. The solo tenor is W. W. Davis. Clement Rowlands, who succeeded Ben Clark as choirmaster at the First Presbyterian Church, is the possessor of a fine baritone voice which he understands how to use to advantage. Putnam Griswold, the concert basso soloist, is now heard at the First Congregational. At this latter church George Collins, Henry Knox and Walter Nicholson are three strong bassos, and Professor Meredith is the solo tenor. A favorite contralto at the First Congregational is Miss Edith Phelps. A. R. Dow, a baritone of much range, is the choirmaster of the First Baptist, where there is also a good voluntary choir. The First Unitarian Church has no choir at present, but Dr. Edward von Adelung, a baritone singer, acts as precentor.

The Episcopal churches of Oakland can boast of some remarkably fine vested choirs. The credit of this is due to the efforts of the late rector of the Church of the Advent, Rev. Marshal Law, who was a fine musician and had in his wife a talented organist. Dr. Law was the first to introduce a mixed vested choir in Oakland and his example was largely followed. After his retirement the choir was allowed to run down, but it has again reached its standard under the leadership of W. Sabin and his organist Mr. Schurenstein. The organization now consists of about fifty voices, two-thirds of whom are young men and women. The membership at present is as follows: Miss Mary Stalder, Mrs. Hoagland, Mary Harrold, Eveline Ellis, May Tillotson, Clare Gossip, Ethel Nagle, Edna Price, Bessie Cullen, Maud Wilkins, Marian Ellis, Grace Read, Matilda Brunker, Elizabeth Harrold, Hettie Cadman, Grace Stalder, Lloyd Callison, Fred E. Wilkins, Charles E. Zander, Joseph Petty, Pope C. Hartman, Herbert Read.

The vested choir at St. Paul's is under the leadership of Mr. Robert C. Newell. There are about thirty young women in the choir, the most prominent being Miss Mary Chester Williams a soprano, Miss Gretchen Bernett, contralto, Miss Pope, soprano, Miss Pauline Fore and Miss Sharon. E. D. Crandall, tenor, Harry Thomas, basso, Otto Wedemeyer and Phil Abbott, bassos, are members of this organization. The Episcopal churches of St. John's and St. Andrew's have also good choirs. Indeed, there is hardly a church in Oakland that does not give particular attention to its music.

Among the leading singers in Oakland are some few who, though not attached to any particular church, are heard on the occasion of church festivals. Among these are Harry W. Melvin, who could have made a success as a professional, George Carlton, who also missed his calling, and Horace A. Redfield, a clever tenor singer who has been with St. Paul's for many years. Alfred Wilkie is another who is heard from on all great occasions. Mention of the church singers of Oakland would be incomplete without a reference to Mrs. Blake Alverson, who has for more than sixty years sung in public and who is to-day still in the enjoyment of much youthful vigor and strength of voice. She still follows the profession of music and her judgment of voices is regarded as well-nigh infallible. Not long ago she sang in public and astonished an audience with her excellent work.

THEATRICAL NOTES.

West's Big Minstrel Jubilee is to be the attraction at the Columbia Theatre.

There will be two performances, afternoon and evening, at the Grand Opera House, Sunday, by the Brownies, under Fred Conder's management.

The Neill Company, which has been playing a successful engagement in Los Angeles, will open at the California on Monday night in "A Bachelor's Romance."

Ignace Paderewski will give his last recital in San Francisco at the California Theatre Sunday evening, April 8th, when he will present a request programme.

An event of musical importance will be the appearance of Alexandre Petschnikoff, the "tone poet of the violin," and Mark Hambourg, the young Russian pianist, assisted by Aime Lachaume, the well-known accompanist and conductor. Three concerts will be given at the California Theatre on the afternoons of Monday, Tuesday and Friday, April 16th, 17th and 20th. At the first concert Petschnikoff and Hambourg will play with a symphony orchestra.

Although the best part of the program this week at the Orpheum consisted of hold-overs, there were two or three interesting new numbers. Harry Cogill, who appeared with May Arlea in a musical comedy sketch, will hardly be remembered by many of the younger theatre-goers. This is his first appearance in his native city for fifteen years. His songs were well received. Will Matthews and Nellie Harris made a hit with their farce, "Adam the Second." Next week Bobby Gaylor, dialect comedian, entertainer and singer, will tell some of his funny stories. The De Forrests, dancers of the whirlwind order are also scheduled. The Empire Quartette will present a musical comedy, "Only a Joke." Si Stebbens appears as a slight-of-hand performer and monologist.

"The Bohemian Girl" will be played at the Tivoli next week.

Beginning with a matinee Saturday afternoon, the students of the University of California will give a series of entertainments for the purpose of raising funds to send their track team East. The programme for the first five performances will consist of a farce by Richard Walton Tully, entitled, "James Wobberts, I. S. S. Boston." The cast will consist entirely of collegians.

New Stories Re-Told.

x x x

A MOTION TO ADJOURN.—Senator Pettus of Alabama is noted for a ponderous solemnity of manner and a slow and stately manner of oratory, and on account of his great age is humored by his colleagues. While Senator Spooner was arguing on the Quay case Pettus arose. "I should like to ask the Senator to give way for a motion, if he pleases," he remarked in his funereal way. "I will agree to anything the Senator wants me to," replied Mr. Spooner smilingly, "except to vote against my convictions on a constitutional question." "I am not asking you to do that," said Mr. Pettus, still mysterious, but I want you to give way to a motion." "Well, what is it?" asked Mr. Spooner. "It is to adjourn," answered Mr. Pettus, in his melancholy voice and without a smile. Every member of the Senate laughed, and the motion to adjourn was carried.

HER IDEA OF AMERICA.—It was the habit of an American theatrical manager temporarily living in London to visit a certain public house just about bedtime and invest tuppence in bitter ale, incidently chatting with the barmaid. Business called him home on a flying trip and he was absent from London exactly a fortnight. "You've been away, 'aven't you?" said the barmaid with a smile of greeting when he dropped in for his ale on the night of his return. "Yes," he replied, "I took a run over to America since I saw you last." The girl dropped the pitcher with a crash and her placid blue eyes bulged with amazement. "Blime me!" she gasped. "Why, Hi thought Hamerica was an island haway hout in the Pacific Hocean."

x

THE DIFFERENCE.—Congressman Littlefield, during the last national campaign was down for one address in a Maine county-seat. "This, gentlemen and ladies," said the chairman, introducing him to the audience, "is Hon. Chas. E. Littlefield, known from Eastport to York as the one great orator of Maine. He will talk to you from the setting of the sun to the rising thereof." (Mild applause.) The orator stepped forward. "Gentlemen," said he, "you and the chairman have my permission to stay until the rising of the sun if you want to, but as for myself, I'll tell you right now, I'm going to be outside this hall in just fifty minutes." (Tumultuous cheering.)

x

A FEAT BEYOND HIM.—A Scottish prison chaplain, recently appointed, entered one of the cells on his first round of inspection, and, with much pomposity, thus addressed the prisoner who occupied it. "Well, my man, do you know who I am?" "No, nor I dinna care!" was the nonchalant reply. "Well, I'm your new chaplain." "Oh, ye are? Then I hae heard o' ye before!" "And what did you hear?" returned the chaplain, his curiosity getting the better of his dignity. "Well, I heard that the last twa kirks ye were in ye preached them baith empty; but ye willna find it such an easy matter to do the same wi' this one."

x

THE PARTRIDGE'S LEGS.—A country magistrate in England had to try as his first case a man charged with poaching. "I wish to ask witness a question," he said to the gamekeeper who was in the witness-box, and the magistrate's impressive air commanded immediate and expectant silence in the little court-house. "You say, sir, that you distinctly observed two legs of a partridge protruding from the prisoner's pocket. Now attend very closely to what I am about to say, for much may depend upon your answer. In your opinion were they the hind or the fore legs?"

x

HE WAS OVERCOME.—A Chicago showman recently advertised a "piano-playing elephant" and drew a crowd for the first performance. After a preliminary "spiel," describing the talents of the beast and his education, the elephant was led into the ring. He stepped up to the piano, ran a scale, stopped, lifted his trunk and ran, bellowing, from the tent. The showman stepped forward. "Ladies and gentlemen," he said, "an unfortunate occurrence prevents the intelligent animal from continuing the performance. I am sure that you will all respect his reason. He has just recognized his dead mother's teeth in the piano keys."

x

JACK HAD ESCAPED.—A gaunt, muscular woman of fierce mien entered a city hall in a Utah county seat and asked the county clerk to find out if one Jack Peters was married. Search developed the name of John Peters, for whose marriage a license had been issued two years before. "I thought so," said the woman. "Married 'Lize Waters, didn't he?" "The license is issued for a marriage with Miss Eliza Waters." "Yep. Well, I'm 'Lize. I thought I'd ought to come in and tell you that Jack Peters has escaped."

PALACE and GRAND HOTELS

For nearly a quarter of a century these Hotels have been the recognized headquarters for Tourists and Travelers visiting San Francisco.

Their popularity has been acquired by reason of their unique location (being accessible to wholesale and shipping districts and amusement centers), the peculiar excellence of cuisine and service, and moderate charges.

The Grill Rooms for ladies and gentlemen have an international reputation, and the recently added Supper Room is now recognized as the place to obtain after-theatre refreshments.

EVENTS CURRENT.

The South African War.

The second stage of the South African war—the advance from Natal and Orange Free State into Transvaal proper—opens almost as disastrously for the British as did the first stage. The ground which Marshal Lord Roberts won in his advance from Kimberley to Bloemfontein has been partially re-occupied by the Boers; the districts of Natal and the Free State which seemed to have been pacified after the capture of Cronje are disturbed again; and the Boers have made another of their wholesale captures of British troops. This disaster took place near Bethany April 5. The burghers lured their enemy into an ambush, a veritable trap, and captured them with small loss of life on either side. The total loss in prisoners was about five hundred. The British gained a minor victory the same day, capturing fifty Boers and killing in the attack General Count de Villebois-Mareuil, chief of staff of the Boer army and the strategist who has planned most of their campaigns. He was a French officer, and enlisted with the Boers for love of fighting. With Joubert, Cronje and Mareuil gone, the Boer army is crippled by the loss of its three best generals. It becomes plain that the Transvaal forces have taken the offensive and overrun Orange Free State with a political rather than a military object. After the surrender of Bloemfontein, the Dutch population outside of Transvaal showed a disposition to favor the victors. It looked for a time as though the majority of the Free Staters would submit quietly. The advance of the Boers and the minor successes of this week came just in time. Resistance is growing in the Free State and its borders. So far have the mobile Dutch forces advanced, that a Boer commando is now occupying the laager where Cronje was captured over a month ago. Roberts's inability to hold the ground which he has won and to make a counter-advance on Pretoria is ascribed to a lack of transport. The unacclimated horses of the British army have been dying by regiments, and the survivors are weak and worn out by the unaccustomed temperatures. About the only beasts which seem to take kindly to the work are American mules, and these, of course, cannot be used for cavalry mounts but only as baggage carriers. Supplies are also low, especially winter clothing. Roberts has evidently settled himself for a winter campaign, and London has abandoned the hope of a speedy end for the war. Roberts's army is so much larger than that of the Boers that there is little danger of an actual siege, but the Boer commandos which surround him on every side are in a position to make all sorts of trouble. The railroad, especially, is a source of anxiety, and to General Kitchener has been confided the important task of keeping it open. A garrison at Wepener has just been isolated and is possibly in for a siege. The plucky defence of Mafeking was still maintained on March 27, when the last news came through.

The Political Condition of China.

Following on the heels of the "open door" agreement entered into, at the behest of the United States, by the Powers interested in China, comes a statement that these powers are to combine to protect Europeans against the "Boxers," that powerful secret society which has been so strengthened by the late reactionary edicts of the Empress Dowager and which has been murdering and insulting missionaries. The father of the new child Emperor is at the head of this guild, which is against all progress and works by violence. It is understood that, while our Minister will be expected to use every means to protect Americans, he is instructed not to make an alliance with the other representatives to force the Empress to terms. Indeed, the present disturbance is not yet a serious one, and the probable reason for such action now is the greed of the Powers and their desire to gain territory when the long-looked-for "breaking up of China" shall take place—an event which France, Russia and Germany can be depended upon to hasten by every means in their power. Conservative authorities on the Chinese Empire hold that the Imperial reaction is nothing so serious as is generally believed. The Empress Dowager, they hold, only intervened to save the empire from breaches of national conservatism which hurt the government with the common people. The reforms inaugurated by the late Emperor were inspired by foreign diplomats and were entirely too sweeping and radical to be received in such a country as China. There is no assurance that the woman who governs China does not favor gradual reform; her opposition to the old policy was based on its haste. There are no insurmountable obstacles to progress under her rule. The "open door" agreement projected and carried through by the present administration in this country is not taken any too seriously by the European governments. In the first place, it is pointed out that agreeing to the convention is one thing and keeping and enforcing such an agreement is another. Again, the United States, on which lies the burden of enforcing the terms, is the only party to the convention which has no direct "sphere of influence" in China. These same "spheres of influence" present another difficulty. If they were exact and defined it would be very different, but they are not, being extremely hazy. Again, the agreement tacitly regards the people of China as mere vassals of Europe, a position which they do not occupy by any means. For all that, the United States, with no direct interest in Chinese politics, is yet recognized as holding the balance of power in the relations between the Occident and the Orient.

Admiral Dewey as Presidential Candidate.

The political sensation of the week and, indeed, of the season, was Admiral Dewey's announcement of his willingness to be a candidate for President, presumably upon the Democratic ticket. The statement was made by the Admiral himself at Washington last week. He declared that he has reversed his decision on account of the evident desire of many of his countrymen that he should be a candidate. At the time of his previous refusal, he believed that he would not be competent to fill the place; since then he has studied the situation and learned that the President's chief duty is to obey the orders of Congress, a task for which he believes himself competent. In this declaration, he made no mention of either party; the American flag, he said, was good enough platform for him. But other events have shown that he is aiming for the Democratic nomination. He has announced in an interview that he is a Democrat and that, although he has never voted in his life, he came very near to voting for Cleveland when the latter was a candidate. This mild declaration is enough to show the direction of his intentions. At this length of time from the national campaign, it looks as though the Admiral were aiming at a nomination by the Democratic party on a gold standard, free trade and anti-imperialist platform. This will bring him point to point with Bryant the old-school Democrats backing the Admiral, the Populis, element supporting the Boy Orator. Most Democrats believe that Bryan and free silver have too strong a grip on the party to be loosened even by Dewey. Futhermore, the Admiral's popularity is not what it was just after his return. In case Bryan wins the Democratic nomination, Dewey may very likely head a third ticket; in case Dewey is nominated at Kansas City, there is every probability that Bryan will head a Populist ticket. In either case, the a mosphere is cleared for the Republicans. It is certain that Democrats of the Cleveland school are behind the Dewey candidacy and it is still more certain that his wife has been stirring up the Presidential bee in his bonnet.

Floods at Austin, Texas.

The uncertain and dangerous Colorado river has again sustained its reputation as a destroyer. Last week, the spring freshets burst the great dams above the city of Austin, Texas, sending a great mass of water down the channel and into the lower part of the city, drowning not less than seventy-five people and destroying millions of dollars in property. The disaster began in the morning of April 7th, when the dam gave way, carrying off with it a power house which was used to turn the waters into electricity and drowning eight workmen employed there. It had been raining hard for a week, and every sort of debris was piled up against the dam, even frame houses and river boats. The citizens of Austin had been making every effort to clear away this accumulation but without avail; at last the swollen waters broke away in a solid wall of water 25 feet high and 500 feet wide and flooded the lower town. Word was sent by telegraph to all settlements along the valley and horsemen covered the districts between, so that loss of life was much less than it would have been had the break occurred unexpectedly at night. But even then, many were caught and many more had narrow escapes. The total damage is about $3,000,000. Of this, the railroads entering the city are the heaviest private losers. The city of Austin owned the power plant at the dam, from which it drew its water-supply, electric lighting and manufacturing power. Consequently, there will be no lights in the streets or public buildings until the break is repaired, and many large manufacturing concerns must shut down for the time being. A more serious danger, however, is the failure of the water supply. Unless this is renewed within a very short time, the sanitary condition of the city must become unendurable.

Delay in Canal Legislation.

So ar as this session of Congress is concerned, all action on the Nicaragua Canal question is effectually blocked. The mistake made fifty years ago, when this country gave Great Britain a share in the interoceanic canal, has proved the undoing of all measures looking toward a permanent construction of the waterway. The Hay-Pauncefote Treaty, by which Great Britain relinquished her claim in return for an assurance that the canal should be neutral, was very distasteful to the Senate and to the country in general. It was apparent at once that it could never be ratified as it stood, notwithstanding the advocacy of Senator Morgan and other friends of the canal. An attempt to remedy this came in the shape of an amendment by Senator Davis, providing that "none of the stipulations of the treaty shall apply to measures which the United States may find it necessary to take for securing by its own forces the defense of the United States and the maintenance of public order." This did not have the least effect in changing the Senate's opinion. The majority of that body stood firm for absolute fortification of the waterway; if anything, the compromise measure weakened its chances. Last Thursday, the amended treaty came up before an executive session of the Senate. The debate then held proved conclusively that the measure had no chance of passage, and the Republican leaders decided to save time for other important business by dropping it entirely. The canal matter will therefore be held in abeyance until the next session of Congress, after the Presidential election.

The Status of the Southern Negro.

The New York Society of Ethical Culture has been holding sessions lately over the negro question in the South. While the opinions advanced by that society count for very little as a rule, this discussion was made of special interest by the fact that it was participated in by such prominent students of the question as W. H. Baldwin and Professor Felix Adler, and by intelligent graduates of the negro industrial schools. All the speakers admitted that the second crisis in the history of the American negro is close at hand. The attempt at disenfranchisement in several Southern states and the spread of lynching as a punishment for negro crimes assure this fact. It was admitted by almost all the speakers, including the negroes themselves, that the fine social distinction between white and black was just and should be respected; the two races can never amalgamate. W. H. Baldwin stated that, in his belief, deportation of the negro is out of the question. The South is dependent on negro labor. A negro and a mule form the only combination which can raise cotton in the South. Referring to the abuses of the blacks, he said that there was never any question of the moral integrity of the blacks toward the whites before the war. It is possible that the first lynchings were justifiable; now, however, the thing is a terrible abuse. Of the 127 negroes lynched in the South last year, many died for crimes other than the one for which lynching is made the excuse. As it is, it would be impossible to avenge the lynching of a Southern negro by process of law. Two methods of reform are advocated by Mr. Baldwin. The first is the giving of personal assault right of way in the courts; the second is the enforcement of a rule that the families of persons lynched shall be indemnified by the community in which the lynching occurs. Discrimination against nego voters he condemned as cutting off the best instrument of progress, and he emphasized education as a means of advancement. The graduates of the negro schools took up most of their time in describing the work of those institutions and in advocating the value of education.

Special Taxation in Porto Rico.

Since the passage of the House Bill imposing a small tariff (25 per cent of the Dingley rate) on the products of Porto Rico, the yellow anti-administration papers have been abusing Congress and the Government for the so-called "oppression" in Porto Rico. As was to be expected, the Examiner-Journal has been the leader in this phantom crusade, and has perpetrated, through its expert liar James Creelman, a sensational account of the starvation, nakedness and desolation following in the wake of American rule in the islands. How much lighter is this mild impost than the crushing and oppressive tax system of the Spaniards is proved by a timely statement just issued by the Treasury Department. Soon after the American occupation, the Bureau of Statistics sent a special agent to investigate the Spanish tax system. The statement is taken from his report to the President. Customs duties were levied upon imports and exports. There was a special tax on the loading of freight and another on incomes direct, this last being planned to furnish the bulk of the revenue. Then there was an industrial and commercial tax, graded according to the population of towns and cities. This was stretched so as to cover every form of business and every sort of salary. No business enterprise whatsoever but was licensed, as is the liquor trade in the United States. This tax was especially heavy on the salaries of corporation officials and the income of professional men. All commissions on business transactions paid a heavy tax, as did all contracts of whatever sort. Large fees were required for permission to start a commercial enterprise of any sort whatever. There was a complicated system of grading which mixed matters while it did not lighten the burden. Taken all in all, these imposts were so heavy that, had the laws been enforced, no business could have been transacted. But the laws were not enforced, owing to the ease with which the officials could be bribed. From this it happened that the taxes rested most heavily on the poorer class, which could not afford bribes. It is also claimed by the Porto Ricans that the Spanish officials discriminated in favor of the Spanish. Unless bribery was employed or special favor extended, the taxation was terribly onerous. In the language of the report: "From this brief review of the systems of taxation it will be seen that if the laws had been faithfully administered no person and no article or form of property could have escaped his or its share of the public burden. The earnings of merchants, manufacturers and other producers were subject to a tax of 12½ per cent or more, according to the financial exigencies of the treasuries, provincial and municipal. For example, if a merchant's income were valued at $10,000 a year, he would pay in direct taxes $1,250. He would also pay for his cedula or personal passport, the amount of which was graduated, according to personal means, from 12 cents up to $25 or more. He would pay direct taxes on his residence and furniture and on his horses and other livestock, if not used for labor. If he were just starting in business, he would pay a patente or tax for the privilege. And yet the general testimony was to the effect that taxation was not really oppressive, or would not have been, if it had been impartially assessed and collected. But the fact that it was so heavy doubtless had an influence in inducing people to conceal their property as much as possible and undervalue their annual income.

Discouraging Situation in the Philippines.

Among army officers stationed at the front, all hope of a speedy ending to our Filipino war is abandoned. The insurrection has lost mass, coherence and general direction, but it has drifted into a nasty little guerilla warfare which is more trying to the troops than the actual opposition of last spring. A striking commentary on prevailing conditions comes in a dispatch from the front which describes a hot brush with a Filipino outpost five miles from Manila. We were fighting further out than that a month after the insurrection opened. Brushes of respectable size have taken place during the week in Laguna Province, at Aparri, Cagayan Province, in Capiz Province, Island of Panay, and in Calbayon, Island of Sumur, where the rebels have been especially troublesome. In each of these engagements our troops have held their own, but all presented a striking similarity. The rebels did not attack in the open, but harassed our troops from the brush and mainly by night. General Young, commanding in northern Luzon, reports that he is having much trouble with this widespread guerilla warfare, and needs more troops to garrison the towns which he is attempting to hold. His men are worn out by the necessity of eternal vigilance, and the insurgents are returning to the district and murdering amigos wholesale. He wishes reinforcements in order to clean out the district under his command before the rainy season begins. General Bell in south Luzon has a similar story to tell. The president of Samal, a friendly town in his district, has been murdered because of his relations with the Americans. It seems, indeed, to be a part of the new and lawless insurgent policy to murder friendly natives wherever found in order that others may be terrorized into joining their ranks.

Railway Relief Insurance.

THE recent discussion by the press of the "Railway Relief Insurance" plan is typically Californian. Probably no railway in America is more popular with its employes than the Pennsylvania Company. Yet that corporation has for years maintained just such a relief insurance. The writer several years ago discussed with the late President Thompson of the Pennsylvania road the relations existing in Pennsylvania between the railroad and its men. Among other things, Mr. Thompson mentioned that the corporation took the savings deposits of its employes, upon which it paid a given amount of interest per annum. Asked how these the trust funds were invested, Mr. Thompson turned to the annual report of the Pennsylvania Railway and pointed to a list of bonds. It comprised the issues of numerous branch lines of the Pennsylvania Railway. "These bonds are the securities of your own corporation are they not?" was asked. "Every one of them," he responded. "You could not do that in California without criticism." "And why not?" asked the railway president.

"We have in California a press that is willing to engage in any devilment, exploit any sensation that will be apt to mislead the public into hating the railroads, or stirring up their employes to strikes or controversies. The day after the publication of a report such as that of the Pennsylvania road, the daily papers of San Francisco would begin a crusade, declaring that the savings of the wage-earner were being put in jeopardy; that the railway company was wrongfully investing the trust fund in its own bonds; and they would keep up a tremendous howl until timid railway depositors were stampeded into withdrawing their funds."

The Pennsylvania Railway president could not understand this condition of affairs and it is a little difficult to convey to the mind of any staid Easterner a full conception of the conditions existing here. The contemplated Relief bureau —according to the newspapers—has been finally rejected by the Southern Pacific employes and the matter has been dropped by the officers of the company. Perhaps the plan as proposed contained some particular provisions that rendered it unpopular; as to this we do not know, but if that be so, a movement fraught with so many benefits to the worker should not be wholly rejected on account of minor defects. It is always a mistake for employes to neglect the smallest opportunity that will serve to bring them into closer and more intimate relations with the employer. The Pennsylvania road, as we have said, conducts just such a department as this proposed "Relief Bureau": its engineers, conductors, brakemen are loyal to every interest of the road. It is in fact, part of them. They know that in old age they will be provided for; they know that when sick or injured, provision has been made for their care; they know that neither political pull nor relationship with the executive officers will place a man unjustly over their heads; they are on such terms and are so closely knit to each other that a perfect unity of interests is fully recognized on both sides. The employes resent assaults upon the corporation, as they would attacks upon themselves. No wonder the noisy press of California bitterly opposes the creation or the growth of any such sentiment in California. At Altoona, where the Pennsylvania shops are located, is a library maintained for the benefit of employes. It is free to them. The librarian, the assistants, the janitor, and the men and women connected with its administration, are either old employes or their widows or children. In the yards, engaged in light occupations, are old men, some with a leg cut off, some minus an arm. Upon the streets of Altoona, or basking in the sunshine on their porches, you will find old Pennsylvania men retired upon the pension. The young mechanic who works in the shops and rides to and from home on a bicycle, on entering the shop yards turns his machine over to an ancient employe, who houses it, oils it, rubs it off, and holds it in readiness for its owner when the whistle blows "quitting time." Attached to the library is an assembly hall, where lectures, social dances, and similar entertainments are given—all free to the employes and their guests. The plan recently proposed by the Southern Pacific was a step toward bringing about similar relations between the western railroads and its men. It is unfortunate that a hostile press was permitted to distort the character of the movement, before the employes had given the matter fair consideration. And it is doubly unfortunate for the employes, if they have closed the door to any amended or modified form of a "Relief Bureau." For their own sakes they should get together, appoint a committee of conservative representatives, and re-open the subject with a view to establishing a basis upon which they can come together. If in the Southern Pacific's company there are any old employes of the Pennsylvania road, they should constitute themselves a committee to demonstrate the workings of the Relief Bureau.

California's Next Senator.

IT is not yet too early to give consideration to the matter of a successor to George C. Perkins as United States Senator. At he coming fall election twenty State Senators are to be elected who will hold over and participate in the election of Mr. Perkins's successor. The sensational contest that will take place nearly three years hence, will therefore be influenced to a marked extent by the election almost at hand. Of the twenty retiring Senators, eleven are republicans, nine are democrats. After all is said and done, it is the people of the State who in point of fact name our Senators. Politicians may pull and wrangle, yet it avails but little unless the candidate has the confidence of the great body of the people. If the voters themselves desire to name a United States Senator, the process is simple in the extreme. If in this case they desire to take a hand in naming Mr. Perkins himself they may do so, and fix with certainty upon their choice. It is merely a matter of selecting, for legislative nomination, men who will be Perkins's friends; and for fear that a cog might slip somewhere, let them instruct their legislative nominees to support their choice. If called upon to name in all of the State of California a man who enjoyed to the most marked degree the respect and confidence of the people, we would name George C. Perkins. He has enemies; what man who performs his duty has not? He is not popular with the bosses; no honest, independent man is ever popular in that direction. He has made mistakes—that is the common lot of every man who does anything. It is only the man who does nothing who never makes a mistake, it is only the man who refuses to fight who never loses a contest. But no man great or small, in or out of this State, can with truth upon his lips declare that Senator Perkins has ever violated a confidence placed in him, or that he has ever wrongfully misrepresented the State; or that he is, or ever has been, corrupt or corruptible; or that he has a spot or blemish in his record, extending back over this State's history for over a quarter of a century. Back in the older states of the union, where possibly there is more available senatorial timber than we have in California, it is the custom—and a creditable custom it is—for the state legislatures to return such men as George C. Perkins to Washington so long as they are willing to remain in public service. As a result such states are not only always ably represented, but their Senators become men of national fame, versed in national affairs, and competent not only to serve their state, but the nation. One term in the United States Senate rarely does more than to introduce a man to official life. Two terms gives him an experience and familiarity with the committee work, an acquaintance in the departments, and a standing with the administration that only time can bring. The power of a Senator at Washington in the closing years of his term will wax stronger or draw weaker according to the probabilities of his returning. The state that is ever changing its Senatorial representatives wastes its influence. Convince an administration or the various departments that the State of California has confidence in "this man" and will return him to the Senate, six, twelve and eighteen years hence, and you at once arm a man, whoever he may be, with unlimited power to serve the State. Serve notice in Washington that "this man" will be defeated at the end of his term, and that a new man will be sent forward, and you also serve notice on the powers that they need do nothing of lasting good, nor do more to placate or please your Senator than to temporize with him, and "jolly him along" for a few years. California does not want to be "jollied along," nor does it want to adopt the suicidal policy of crippling the arm that has been put forward to protect and upbuild her resources and industries. Let us settle down to a definite and sensible [illegible] in things political.

Whose Dupe is Dewey?

BEFORE Admiral Dewey returned to the United States from Manila he was tendered, as it were, the Presidential nomination, first, by a "special commissioner" of the Journal-Examiner; and latterly, by William C. Whitney. The presumption is that these gentlemen represented to the Admiral that they spoke for the Democracy of the country. Meaning, the great mass of the people. In response to such tender, the then great man, the distinguished Admiral said, in effect: "I am only a sailor; not a politician or a statesman. Am unfitted by lack of knowledge and experience to assume the duties and responsibilities of the high and honorable office of President." What has caused the Admiral to change his mind upon the very vital question of his unfitness for the Presidency? By what influence is he made to see that he is just the man at this juncture for President, and that his countrymen demand that he shall waive all objections and accept the high office? Admiral Dewey is reported to have explained that some of the most prominent men of both political parties are among his advisers entreating him to stand for the Presidency. It is due the people that the Admiral should confide in them and disclose the names of these prominent men. Competent judgment might then be formed as to the reason for the movement, or the play.

When questioned as to what would be his platform, Dewey replied: "How would the American flag do?" We recollect having heard this from another source. Mr. Bourke Cochran, gold-standard, trust and anti-imperialist orator and advocate, announced: "The American flag and the Declaration of Independence is all the platform that is required to win upon." Mr. Cochran is ostensibly opposed to President McKinley's policy as to the insular possessions of the United States, but supports him in every other regard. Equally or more opposed is Mr. Cochran to W. J. Bryan and his Nebraska platform, with the possible exception of the position taken as to the Philippines and Porto Rico. The views held by Mr. Cochran are coincided in by thousands of Democrats and thousands of Republicans. But could Dewey consistently stand on a platform declaring for the non-retention of the Philippines?

Admiral Dewey is reported to have said that his platform as candidate for the Presidency would be the Constitution. As President he would find that troubles multiplied on his hands with a prolificness that would bewilder him, should he be placed in a position of authority and did undertake to govern the Philippine Islands and Porto Rico as colonial dependencies of the United States, conforming such policy to the spirit and letter of his avowed platform—the Constitution. But mayhap he has in reserve the politician's recourse. He would cease to abide by his platform so soon as he got into office, averring with autocratic disdain: "A platform is made only to get in upon, not to stand on after getting in!"

There are some illustrious examples of this kind of fidelity to platform principles now shining in our very recent history, like a black cat in the moonlight.

But why animadvert? Admiral Dewey is as near to being President of the United States to-day as he will ever be. It is not impossible that he may be a candidate. He is reported to have said, that, failing to receive a party nomination he would run as an independent if the people wanted him. Now, just what or who he means by "the people," one can only guess at. There is a great fisherman who has his abode 'mid the classic shades of Princeton; he is some of "the people." Then, too, there is an aristocratic multi-millionaire with Standard oil connections, who would like much to be the occupant of the White House himself; he is some more of "the people." Again, there is a man who tries to live in two sections of the Union at the same time and escape paying taxes in either, who, report says, has hired headquarters at a Kansas City hotel, to be occupied by himself "and a friend" during the Democratic convention; he is another "some of the people." And last, but not least, there is a wily schemer from an Atlantic state who goes to the Kansas City convention with his state delegation pocketed for himself; he thinks, on this and other accounts, that he is considerable of "the people." Wherefore, if Admiral Dewey predicates his running as an independent candidate upon "the people" wanting him to do so, it is safe to assume that "the people" as indicated will not be shy in letting their want in this particular be known.

But a truce to badinage! How saddening it is to contemplate the humiliating position Admiral Dewey has been forced into by these political schemers. And the worst feature of the deplorable business is that they seem to have made use of the ambition of the Admiral's wife to inveigle him into announcing himself a candidate for the presidential nomination. It is really too bad that he did not adhere manfully to his first declared purpose not to aspire to an office for which he is unfitted. As the nation's naval hero and highest admiral, Dewey was and may yet be a world cynosure, but as an aspirant for the Presidency, he is the dupe of a coterie of self-seeking politicians, who pulled him down into the dust of humiliation in fruitless endeavor to raise themselves out of political obscurity for their own aggrandizement.

E. S. Pillsbury, Counsel for the Pacific Coast Jobbers Ass'n.

AN INTERSTATE RATE COMPLICATION.

St. Louis Wholesalers vs. San Francisco Jobbers.

THE proceeding of the Interstate Commerce Commission now in session in Portland is of great importance to wholesale merchants of the Pacific Coast. The contention, in brief, is a demand formulated by the jobbers of St. Louis that freight rates between East and West on commodities in carload lots be equalized, to agree with charges made on commodities in less than carload lots. Further, that the differentials allowed to Pacific Coast points, in consequence of water competition, be abolished.

The wholesale merchant of the Middle West desires to compete for all of the trade of the territory between the Mississippi River and the Pacific Ocean. His proximity to the manufacturing centres of the East gives him an advantage as against dealers located further West because of the long and short haul clause of the Interstate Commerce Law. But the existence of a water route to San Francisco and Seattle enables merchants at these points to obtain goods directly from the East by sea, consequently the cost of ocean freight determines the railroad freight charges between the East and the Pacific seaboard. This advantage of location neutralizes natural conditions and enables Pacific jobbers to supply a restricted territory the limitations of which are clearly defined by local rates. For instance, John Jones, selling in San Fradcisco stoves made in Pittsburg, can furnish Julius Johnson, dealer at Reno, Nevada, stoves at a lower price than Frederick Williams can who handles the same class of stoves in St. Louis. This though said stoves are shipped direct by railroad from Pittsburg to San Francisco and are then re-packed and dispatched to Reno. The advantage John Jones enjoys over his St. Louis competitor is that ocean carriers have compelled the reduction of railroad rates on stoves to San Francisco and therefore abrogated at that point the long and short haul clause of the Interstate Commerce Law. His territory then is the country in which local rates on stoves from San Francisco are lower than local rates on stoves from St. Louis. The operation of the conditions set forth has been to build up a jobbing trade in the larger cities of the Coast. The Business Men's League of St. Louis would change all this, would have the Interstate Commerce Commission rule, to use the same instance, that a lower rate must not be made between Pittsburg and Reno than between the former point and San Francisco. If this were conceded, Frederick Williams' location would command Julius Johnson's patronage, and John Jones would be eliminated as a factor save in the shipment of articles originating in California.

The investigation into the merits of this controversy developed for the Commissioners the perennial conflict between the jobbers of the coast and the railways. The pacific condition now existing which brings the opposing factions on the same side of the case is an adjustment reached after years of contest and disagreement. The history of the several traffic associations and the North American Navigation Company was fully rehearsed and a great deal of information adduced in regard to business in San Francisco. The leading shippers all gave testimony, and while the evidence submitted may have seemed dull enough to an outsider, in its revelation of commercial facts it was of vital interest to the mercantile element.

The Interstate Commerce Commission, as now constituted, consists of Chairman Martin A. Knapp, of New York; Ex-Governor J. W. Fifer, of Bloomington, Ill.; Judson C. Clements, of Georgia; and J. D. Yoemans, of Washington. Their sessions were held in the court room of the Court of Appeals in the Appraiser's Building, San Francisco. From there they went to Portland to take the testimony of merchants there, and thence proceed to Seattle. The cause of the Pacific Coast jobbers has been presented by E. S. Pillsbury, and that of the Southern Pacific by Chief Counsel W. F. Herrin.

Golden and diamond weddings were celebrated by 614 couples in Prussia in 1899, and the State distributed jubilee medals to each husband and wife. In Berlin and the province of Brandenburg the number of these couples was 115.

The mileage of the four longest railways in America is as follows: Chicago & Northwestern, 8,346 miles; Burlington Route, 8,859; Santa Fe, 7,718; Canadian Pacific, 7,684. Most persons guess the Pennsylvania and the Southern Pacific as among the first four. The Southern Pacific ranks fifth with 7,201 miles; then comes the Pennsylvania with 7,098 miles.

Surely the most profitable syndicate ever organized was a combination of ten Adelaide men who, in June, 1893, subscribed £15 each to form the Coolgardie Prospecting Syndicate which sent mining prospectors to West Australia. Several rich properties, including the Great Bowlder, the Associated Gold Mines, the Ivanhoe and the Lake View, were discovered. For these the syndicate received in cash £1,500,000, and a number of shares which, if capitalized at present, would realize about £9,000,000.

The Russo-Chinese Eastern Railway, which was commenced on August 16, 1897, should be finished as far a Port Arthur by 1901, the whole line being possibly ready for traffic in 1902. The terms agreed upon by the Russo-Chinese Bank with the Chinese government are that the Chinese government may purchase the line, thirty-six years after it has been opened to traffic, by paying the cost of construction, together with interest; or it may take possession, free of cost, after the line has been worked for thirty years by Russia.

For the past thirteen years Ruskin's copyrights brought him an average of $20,000 a year. They must continue a valuable property, though the earlier writings will soon be released from copyright. A careful estimate shows that Ruskin's best selling book has been Sesame and Lilies. After it would come A Crown of Wild Olive, The Seven Lamps of Architecture, and Unto This Last.

ANARCHISTS AND ASSASSINS.

SOME OF THE ATTEMPTS UPON ROYAL AND PRINCELY PERSONAGES IN THE CENTURY.

THE crazy boy anarchist who tried his skill on the Prince of Wales cannot look forward to an enviable future. There is probably a life of prison routine before him, and this in spite of his evident youth and inexperience. Belgium is not easy on its criminals, and I judge that the little land is "riled" clear through at the bad name his action has given it. Yet, the lad is probably very little to be blamed. Such anarchists as he, unbalanced, degenerate, half-educated, half-mad, are the tools of the organization, its ministers of so-called vengeance. The brains of the order are very different men, cool, devilish beings of university education and criminal cunning, who originate the plots and inspire the deeds. Were I the Prince of Wales and desirous of striking a hard blow at anarchy, I would ask Belgium for the life and custody of this lad, would give him, at my own expense, the education, training, refinement of surrounding which his life has lacked, train him to usefulness at the top of his bent, and show him to the world as an example. It would be a shallow argument—but of such arguments is the kingdom of politics.

No little anxiety is caused to the police of any city in Europe by the visitation of a princely or royal personage. It means just so much work "overtime," just so much anxiety and responsibility. For wherever a royalty goes, he must be dogged and spied by the police, whose task is made none the easier by the fact that the important personages themselves object to being guarded. Should the Czar visit Paris, for example, half the police in the capital would tag him in plain clothes, following all his comings and goings, his risings and sittings. But the monarch of all the Russias, having been followed by policemen all his life, knows the tricks and the manners of detectives to a nicety, and can be depended upon to try to give them the slip. This elusive vigilance of their distinguished charge is a greater terror to his shadowers than any possible danger from anarchists. Suppose that he escapes them for even five minutes, and suppose that in that five minutes the trailing assassins get at him—puff! 'Tis all off with the detectives, from chief to subordinate, and the country has a pretty little row on its hands.

Queen Victoria's Escapes.

The whole story of these attempted outrages upon modern rulers has never half been told. The secret history of Queen Victoria's police guard would make a romance alone. Few people outside of the court know how many cranks are picked up every month, at the gates of the royal palaces. It was but last year that a dangerous lunatic of homicidal tendencies was caught waiting for the royal carriage with a whole arsenal on his person. In the days of old, those thought to be dangerous to the life and safety of a sovereign were taken in arbitrarily on lettres de cachet. This has been abolished in England, but an institution just as useful is the Asylum for the Criminally Insane at Broadmoor. In this place are confined, at the present time, at least a dozen persons who have made attempts, at one time or another, upon members of the royal family. I doubt if Queen Victoria knows of the existence of some of these people. It is a part of the instructions given to her secret police that they are to keep the knowledge of danger from their charge. Unless a direct attack is made on her, she never knows of the arrest.

Queen Victoria's escapes have all been "shootin-scrapes"; her assailants have always used the revolver, though she has never once been wounded. So, too, the baby king's Amadeus and Alfonso of Spain have had narrow escapes from the same weapon, and Czar Alexander II was shot at twice. Other rulers who have dodged the bullets of cranks and anarchists during this century include Pope Pius IX, Louis Philippe, the kings Milan and Alexander of Servia, the late king of Holland, Napoleon III, the present kings of Denmark, Wurtemberg and Roumania, Prince Ferdinand of Bulgaria, the late Czarovitch and the Prince of Wales. Yet not one of these princely and royal persons was even touched by these bullets. The only royal person in Europe struck by a bullet within the century was the old Emperor William, who was slightly wounded by a shot from a revolver fired by a Dr. Nobiling. There is no necessity for adding that the rule is broken in America, where two presidents of the United States and many presidents and dictators of the Latin republics have died by lead. The reason given in Europe is that an assassin about to commit a crime as large and important as the murder of a king is unnerved, when he comes to the deed, and his aim becomes impaired. This reason does not operate in America, evidently, but it is explained that the revolver is a native weapon to most Americans, while in Europe the masses are accustomed to avenge themselves with cold steel.

Knife vs. Revolver.

In fact, for every drop of blue blood spilled by the pistol, the knife has drawn its torrents. When an assassin prepares to take a princely life with a revolver, he does so with some hope of escape. This is therefore, the weapon of the timid and the half-convinced. But he who draws the knife does so with no chance of respite. He must certainly be captured and, if he is successful, his end is assured. Therefore, those who use the knife are accustomed to press relentlessly to their purpose. A typical criminal of this class was young Luchesi, who killed the Empress of Austria. The tinsmith who missed two square shots at the Prince of Wales was of the other class—the enthusiast who has to lash himself into a frenzy in order to get up his courage. It needs rare nerve and no little cunning to get within striking distance of a royal personage in these days of plain clothes men; he who can accomplish this feat is not the one to hesitate when the supreme moment is at hand.

Thus, President Carnot and the Empress Elizabeth have both succumbed to a dagger in the past six years. The Emperor of Austria has a terrible scar on his shoulder from a stab received some fifty years ago. The Queen-Regent of Spain bears a similar mark. King Humbert of Italy would have been killed by a knife-thrust at Naples ten years ago, had it not been for the quick action of his Prime Minister, who received the blow himself. King Milan's predecessor on the Servian throne was literally chopped to pieces by paid assassins. Napoleon III was three times in intimate danger from Italian assassins armed with three-cornered files, the weapon used in the murder of the Austrian Empress. In his youth, Napoleon was alleged to have joined the Carbonadi conspiracy for the freeing of Italy. It was to avenge his alleged treason to this cause that the conspirators sought his life, and they had graven on the hilts of their weapons the word, "remember." This sign betrayed the assassins on each occasion. The triangular form of the weapon was designed to cause the lips of the wound to close, making the bleeding internal and putting the victim past surgical help. It will be remembered that the Empress of Austria, although stabbed to the heart, shed scarcely a drop of blood.

Stambuloff, dictator of Bulgaria, was carved to pieces under the windows of Prince Ferdinand's palace. The father of the present Duke of Parma succumbed to a dagger. A list of the persons just below royality in rank who have fallen before the knife in the past two decades includes Prince Daniel of Montenegro, Lord Frederick Cavendish, the Duc de Berri, and the Earl of Mayo. These are only a few instances of the fact that, in the hands of a European criminal, the knife is far more dangerous than the pistol. And yet the police of Europe think lightly of a man with a knife, but turn out the detective force to follow a man with a gun.

In fact, the police force of the European cities, as at present constituted, is the joy and delight of the anarchist. It must not be forgotten that anarchy and nihilism and all the movements and conspiracies which go under those heads are run by men of great intellectual force and keenness. The leaders are mostly university men gone wrong: even the tools are frequently the possessors of an able, though preverted, type of intelligence. On the other hand, the police of Europe, like those of America, are mostly recruited from the same class which furnishes private soldiers to the regular army. They are honest, God-fearing and law-abiding citizens, but their heads are somewhat slow. The average policeman is no match for the average anarchist, and the only safeguard for society and its rulers under present conditions is the number of guardians.

Educated Nihilists.

The statement about the birth and intelligence of the leading anarchists and nihilists is not a strained statement. People in America can have no idea of the number of blue-blooded personages ranged with these destroyers of society. There are princes of the blood royal in Russia, dukes and counts in Germany and France, scientists, scholars, poets, philosophers. Some are in the ranks of anarchy because of real or fancied wrongs inflicted upon them by society, some have taken the step for a preverted belief in the principles of the society, and some, no doubt, are there for pure love of crime. It has been said that if a catalogue were made of the European anarchists and nihilists, the educational average would be higher than that of the French Chamber of Deputies. No one who knows the anarchists doubts this for a moment. Anarchy is one of those forms of mental and moral dyspepsia brought about by fulness of thought.

Indeed, so well is this fact recognized, that supporters of thep owers-that-be have advocated fighting fire with fire and matching intelligent supporters of society against the anarchists and socialists. This was tried in Russia after the assassination of Nicholas II, and proved a failure. A "Holy Band," so-called, was formed among the nobility. Its object was the weeding-out of anarchy and nihilism by nihilist methods. The band rapidly degenerated into a political machine and then into a joke, and did not outlast the year. Russian nihilists have since been left to the regular police.

A bit of an anecdote before I close. When Li Hung Chang last visited Paris, he was an object of special solicitude to the police, who had heard that the League for the Improvement of China was on his trail. However, they showed less caution in tracking him than in following European dignitaries, believing that he would not observe them. But old Li is a man of keen perceptions; so it happened that, driving one day with a diplomat, he asked.

"Who are these grave-faced men who follow me in a carriage wherever I go?"

The diplomat, who must be a born Tallyrand, answered:

"Son of Heaven, they are members of our institute, wise men who, following and observing you, hope to gain wisdom from your ways."

Li Hung Chang said no more, but that afternoon, having left his carriage for awhile, he came back unexpectedly and discovered the carriage-load drinking with his coachman. Li turned to the diplomat. "I observe," he said, "that the members of your institute are not above learning wisdom from the ways of common people." ETIENNE MARCEL.

A PEREMPTORY HERO.

General Kitchner's Manners Unpopular in Cape Town.

IT cannot be said that Lord Kitchener is popularizing himself in South Africa. His reputation for amiability is not being advanced by his manners to the valorous aristocrats whom he finds in charge of regiments and movements. He is brusque, even brutal, in reproving frivolity or tardiness, but his push and energy have already worked a transformation in the management of affairs. Kitchener seems to think that army officers should be as businesslike as mere commercial men and, what is worse, compels promptitude and celerity in those with whom he comes in personal contact. Lord Roberts is an absolutely different type of man and is beloved where the stern martinet is detested. Here is an episode that illustrates the difference between them:

Before Lord Roberts left Capetown he called into his office a certain Colonel, and charged him with a mission. "Now," said the chief, "how soon can you put this through? I know you'll do the best you can." "Well," replied the Colonel, "I'll try to do it in a fortnight." "All right," Roberts replied, "I know you will do the best you can," and with a pleasant smile he dismissed the officer. Outside the door he met Lord Kitchener. "Well?" said Kitchener with businesslike abruptness. "Oh," said the Colonel, "I have just seen the chief; he wants me to do so and so." "When are you going to get it through?" "I promised to try and do it in a fortnight." "Now, Colonel," was Kitchener's retort, "if this is not done within a week we shall have to see about sending you home!" And done it was!

Kitchener is the terror of the gilded youth who go out to South Africa to play at picnicing. He marches around the meeting places of the army beaus, walks into the hotels, sniffs after young subalterns strutting about in Staff uniform, and makes himself generally "unpleasant." The other day he presented himself before one of these peacocky personages, who was lolling about in the grounds of the chief hotel, surrounded by a crowd of female admirers, and abruptly asked the young gentleman what his name was. The young gentleman sprang up, stood to attention, and informed him. "And what are you doing here?" said Kitchener. "Haw!" replied the beauteous youth, "I have just come down from Moddah Rivah!" "Oh!" said Kitchener. "Well, perhaps you had better go back to Moddah Rivah. The train starts at nine o'clock to-night!"

Someone asked Kitchener how he proposed to reorganize the transport service. "Reorganize it?" he interrogated. "I shall organize it,"—this with a characteristically sardonic smile.

But how the great man does work! He goes at it as though he were the traffic manager of a big railway or the president of a department store. One of the correspondents writes thus of an interview with Kitchener in Cape Town:

"I am told to be there 9:10 o'clock. I arrive at 9:05 o'clock and wait in an outer office for what seems an hour. I look at my watch and find it is 9:11 o'clock. I begin to doubt, when I remember that my watch is fast. It is exactly 9:10 o'clock when a door is opened and my name is called. I go into a long room in which are several desks like the desks in the manager's office of a great railway company, and at each desk, bending over piles of papers, sits a high officer. And at the end of the room, at a table which commands a view of all the rest of the room and all the other desks, sits a big, dark, stern man with a heavy mustache, intent upon papers. Before he looks up I have time to note the telephones and neatness and orderliness of the arrangement of the table. When he does look up he keeps his finger on the paper in front of him, marking the place where he left off. I begin to tell what I have to say. He looks at me with very keen, bright, gray-blue eyes, and before I have said ten words he seems to know all the rest, including that which I had planned artfully to lead up to. In ten words he says what he has to say. He asks me about something which he wants to know, hears what I have to say, remarks that he is very busy, and before I have quite realized that I have shaken hands and said good-morning he is bending down again over his papers, deep in a calculation at the point where he left off. And I observe that o the men immediately around him many, down to the meres t subordinates, are men whom he has trained and tried himself at the other end of Africa to know what he wants and to do what he wants.

The deepest interest, it seems, was evoked among the troops in South Africa by the Queen's Christmas present. It was confidently predicted that Her Majesty's present would be ignored, or made a subject for ridicule. On the contrary. One correspondent tried to buy a chocolate box, and here are his three efforts:

The first man was a gunner of the Royal Horse Artillery, and I opened negotiations with the perfectly innocent remark that the box he was carrying was a pretty one. He looked at me rather hard, and his words were plain and few. "Yes, mister," he said, looking from the box to me, "that's a very pritty box; an' wot's more, it ain't for sale." I was crushed. The second attempt was made on a corporal of the Essex Regiment, a ruddy, beefy youth, who looked as though he hadn't got a ha'p'orth of sentiment in all his broad body. I abandoned the innocent opening and boldly asked him what he wanted for his box. He looked at me—sadly, I thought—and shook his head laboriously and continuously, and passed on. I was snubbed. One of the Buffs was my third victim, and, having screwed up the remainder of my courage, I stammered out my offer, which was £2. The Buff was a cockney from the shady side of Deptford Broadway, and two sovereigns tempted him sorely. I could see the struggle between the love of the good things that the possession of £2 made possible and the duty he owed posterity when the box should become one of the glass shaded household gods reclining on the mantel shelf of the front parlor. Duty won, and with many sanguinary adjectives he explained his position. "I'm sendin' it 'ome," he said, apolegetically. "I promised the ole woman"— he was a Reservist. " 'Tant because I couldn't do with the blimey thick uns; any'ow, it's the Old Lady's gift, an' I might be buried without gittin' a medal, an' I 'ave got this; an' any'ow, guvnor, hopin' there's no offence, I'll send it 'ome. You 'aven't got a pipe of 'bacca about yer, 'ave yer?"

I had.

Eighteen thousand women in Cleveland, Ohio, have registered to exercise the school suffrage this spring.

THINGS & PEOPLE

Paris Commission Scandal.

AN ugly scandal is maturing in connection with the proceedings of the California Commission to the Paris Exposition. Instead of the vast sum appropriated being used for the furtherance of the State's interest, the greater part is being frittered away in salaries and needless expenditures rather for the personal pleasure of the Commissioners. The quarters at No. 8 Place de l'Opera for which $10,000 rent has been paid, are fitted up luxuriously at great expense as living and sleeping apar ments for the members of the Commission and their families instead of as a subsidiary display of California products. An office for the Commission is maintained there, and doubtless visiting Californians may be permitted to make it their headquarters, but it is quite outside the intention of the Legislature that so large a sum should be diverted for the mere comfort of the Commissioners. There being but a limited space available for the State's display, it was assumed that rooms be hired wherein the surplus exhibits should be placed. There visitors were to be made acquainted with the calibre of Californian wines and dried and green fruits. For this end some 5,000 bottles of the finest wines were appropriated by the vineyardists, in addition to the wines given for the exhibition. The raisin men packed fancy boxes of their products to be distributed to callers. From all appearances these objects will be defeated, and, though the wines will doubtless be used, I fear no benefit will accrue to the producers. It is hard to understand how an establishment in the Place de l'Opera can possibly be used as an accessory to the exposition, as it bears about the same relation thereto as the Palace Hotel does to the Cliff House. I fear there will be very little result for the $130,000 appropriated, save indeed that the Commissioners, their families and friends, will have had a capital time at the expense of the California taxpayer.

There are other conditions that call for censure as severe. The wine men are especially interested in the success of the viticultural exhibit in Paris. France must purchase many thousand gallons of foreign wines every year to supply her own trade, for the product of the country is far below the demand. There is no reason why the Bordeaux merchants should not consume a large part of the Californian surplus, and it is desirable that a favorable impression be made on them. Viticulturists responded liberally to the demands of the Commission, and supplied 5,000 bottles for the headquarters, 1,600 bottles for the exhibit, and 1 000 for the jury. In order that this wine should be in first-rate condition, extremes of temperature en route must be avoided. In winter, the Sunset route is favored by the wine men, and the assumption was that the high grade vintages would be shipped by the southern road. Unfortunately there arose a disagreement between W. H. Mills of the Southern Pacific and the Commission. By way of vengeance on Mr. Mills the precious cargo of wine was routed via Ogden, Omaha and Chicago to Baltimore, where it was suffered to remain in an unprotected place outside a warehouse for over a month before being loaded on the transport Prairie for transmission to France. The effect of the freezing temperature of the Rocky Mountains on claret is sufficiently familiar to the expert. It is probable the wines will have fermented before the jury handles them. The Commission was warned against sending the wine via Ogden by Charles Richard Dodge, the Government's vit'cultural expert, who protested vigorously against the routing. Professor Wiley, the Commission's expert, was very angry over the affair, but really it was more important to spite the Southern Pacific than that the wines should arrive in condition.

However, there need be no fear that California will not be adequately and intelligently represented at the great exposition, but 'twill be through no work of the State Commission. The Southern Pacific Co. has arranged an exhibit that will do justice to the manifold resources ot the Golden State. It consists of specimens of her innumerable products, photographs and admirably arranged advertising matter. Part of the display is within the exposition; the main section is arranged in a building close to the chief entrance. In extent, variety and interest it far excels what the Commission has gathered, and at about one-third the cost. But Mr. Mills knew how and what to do; the Commission did not.

MR. J. GORDON SMITH has been identified with Western newspaperdom for not more than five years, he having come from Montreal where he formerly held a position on the staff of the Herald, but in that brief time he has forged his way forward until he is now included among the more prominent of the newspaper writers and correspondents of the Northwest. He has a catchy style and when he has laid hands on the elusive "scoop" knows how to tell the story. Mr. Smith has the honor of having given the first facts of the discovery of the Klondike mining district to the world. Fully three weeks before the steamer Excelsior came into San Francisco with the news which fired the gold-seekers and sent the thousands North there came to Victoria on the steamer City of Topeka, one Jack Carr, a United States mail carrier—who by the way afterwards fell from grace and tried to perpetrate upon the world a fake story of the finding of an André pigeon. Carr told on his arrival at Victoria of the rich finds on Eldorado and of the rush to Carmack's discovery. The news was at once telegraphed to several American papers, but most of them made sinister editorial references about large imaginations, and it was not until the Excelsior arrived in San Francisco and the news was confirmed, that some of them wrote congratulating a Victoria correspondent. Mr. Smith is the shipping and foreign editor of the Victoria Times and he it was who wrote the very interesting article on the chief city of the province which appeared in the Victorian edition of The Wave. By an error authorship was credited to J. Gordon "Spring."

Paderewski's Harrowing Experiences.

PADEREWSKI is not altogether happy in his country expeditions. At Sacramento sufficient interest was not developed either over his playing or his personality to attract an audience, and he preferred to be out the expenses rather than perform for a handful of people. At Santa Cruz his experience was exciting rather than comfortable. A mob stormed about the entrance of the concert hall, and for a time Manager Gorlitz was afraid to open the doors lest they crush a way in. Finally Paderewski was apprised of the situation, whereupon he took an axe and stationed himself behind the door, Mr. Gorlitz being armed with a bottle. They were ready there to repel invaders. The spectacle of the great pianist brandishing so primitive a weapon must have been most exhilarating. It presents him in a pose in which his innumerable admirers would find it hard to recognize their hero. The arrival of a detachment of police finally relieved the situation, but it was some time before an army of small boys could be dislodged from the roof, where they hung in clusters. As it was, it seemed that half the population had gathered outside the theatre. When Paderewski and Gorlitz finally emerged, they were almost mobbed. Rather a reflection on the manners of the charming seaside town. In Oakland, Paderewski played in a church. Thousands of people gathered to do honor to the occasion—not inside, indeed, but all around the block. Small boys secured coigns of vantage along the walls, and a few adventurous spirits were on the roof. There was a fair audience, but the real crowd was outside. Now, Paderewski, like all great artists, is very sensitive, and episodes such as these are apt to disturb him. I imagine he was more amused than irritated at Santa Cruz, for the axe was decidedly a new experience. I believe that he is sure of large and interested audiences throughout the Northwest.

During his stay in San Francisco, Paderewski and his wife have lived most of the time on their car "Riva," which was side-tracked at Fourth and Townsend streets. There they gave several dinners, but they also patronized liberally the French restaurants. The great pianist is the soul of hospitality, and really likes nothing better than entertaining his friends. Both he and Madame Paderewski are enamored of San Francisco, especially of Chinatown. They made half-a-dozen tours of the Celestial quarters, traversing the streets and alleyways at all hours of the night. I believe they thoroughly eujoyed their stay. Indeed, he prefers the City of the Golden Gate to any other in America. After much persuasion, Paderewski was induced to face Dr. Arnold Genthe's camera, with the result of a set of really fine portraits, which give an intelligent impression of his picturesque head and face.

The Spring Rush to Nome.

THERE will be "something doing" at Cape Nome this season; further, it would be vain to prophesy. With a population more than doubled in one month, with all the adventurers, all the soldiers of fortune and half the crooks on the Pacific Coast pouring in on the first rush, there should ensue stirring times only second to the days of '49 in San Francisco. It is now near enough to the open season to make an estimate on the first rush. Passages secured in advance number 20,000; as many more will try to make their way north during the summer, and an unestimated number will pour in from Dawson and the other northern camps. Indeed, the Dawson rush has already begun, in spite of the efforts made by that city's papers to check the movement. The next news brought out by returning steamer is likely to be sensational, as all the old claims have been jumped and relocated. The army officers keeping order there will need clear heads and strong hands to hold the turbulent population in check. The first steamer to leave was the British ship Alpha, which sailed from Victoria on April 4. While the passengers on this vessel will undoubtedly be permitted to land, the freight cannot go ashore, as it is on a British bottom. The crew and owners have declared, however, that they will land their goods whether or no, and the summer disturbance at Nome may be opened by this attempt. The American vessels which are to follow carry all sorts of passengers and projects. One boat brings a portable chapel and also the material for a combined gambling-house and concert-hall. A saloon-keeper who accompanies the latter outfit has paid $12,000 for bar privileges for the year 1900.

Judge Greene's Aspiration.

THE patronage of Hawaii, under the new form of government already becomes a subject of consideration. I hear of one aspirant for the position of district judge under the territorial regime, whose candidacy really deserves support. I refer to Judge Greene of Oakland, Cal., who has several times been re-elected to the Superior bench of the region across the bay. Judge Greene is a man of strong individuality and dominance of character whose conduct of his officer has been such as to enforce an absolute trust in his integrity. He is an excellent lawyer and administrator and has long been a vital factor in the litigation of Alameda County.

One English marquis has to work for his living. The Marquis of Normandy, who was a clergyman when he succeeded to the title ten years ago, and is now a canon of Windsor, found his estates heavily encumbered. He thereupon turned schoolmaster and opened a preparatory school for the sons of noblemen and gentlemen that has brought him money.

THE CRUISE OF THE HARTFORD.

BACK STAIRS DIPLOMACY.

Bribery and Corruption in European Statescraft.

WHILE it is undoubtedly true that secret service, bribing of ministers, espionage and underhand work of the sort is less prominent, both in Europe and America, than it used to be, it is also true that no European country could dispense with its secret service at the present time and keep up the struggle for prestige. Time was when these underhanded methods were the staple usages of diplomacy. Philip II of Spain buil up his huge empire mainly by means of a corruption fund derived from the gold of the Indies. White-plumed Henry of Navarre, that cheerful and loveable liar, owed his ascension to the French throne to underhand methods as much as to his valor and his skill at the diplomatic game; later, the three Louises whose successive reigns brought on the revolution used the secret service as the right arm of their rule. These are only isolated examples and can be added to indefinitely. The point is, that "back stairs diplomacy" as exemplified today by Dr. Leyds, the Transvaal European agent, is a survival of an older form which Europe has not entirely dispensed with, just as the sword is still carried on the battlefield, although it has been superseded for practical purposes by the rifle or the revolver.

The world spends yearly about $25,000,000 for secret service—this, at any rate, is the estimate made by those who ought to know. To this immense sum the Transvaal, the smallest government concerned, is the heaviest contributor, being responsible for about $4,000,000. Next, perhaps, is Russia or France, and after that, Germany. England is a light dealer in these goods. The appropriation was only $65,000 last year, and rarely exceeds $100,000. Even at that, about half the sum is returned to the treasury each year. The temper of the English people, who do not number deceit among their faults, is against any such usage. Yet England's unprepared state on the Transvaal border was due as much to this scorn of bribery and corruption funds as to any other cause. The judicious use of spies in northern Natal before the war would have prevented many of the early disasters.

The money goes to the heads of the various government departments, who swear, on receiving it, that they are going to spend it for the public good, and are then questioned no further; the matter is absolutely between the spy, or traitor, and the minister. Even Parliament has no right to question the transaction or to inquire into it.

In France, the abuse of secret service funds is so general that Frenchmen are naming it as one of the causes of the Dreyfus affair. For a long time, this has been the method whereby French politicians could get their hands in the public sack most easily. From the nature of the case, no inquiry can be made into the uses of secret service money. Yet the three yearly appropriations for the purpose come to nearly $300,000. The money is paid out to high officials and not even a receipt is given. Only, once a year the head of the cabinet hands to the president a sealed packet containing the secret service documents for the year. He never opens the packet, and the matter is dropped. It happens, therefore, that anyone who can elaborate a spy scare has a chance of getting into the trough. And more than one theorist on the inexplicable Dreyfus affair holds that the desire of those in high places to "get in on" this fund lay at the bottom of the whole affair.

The reformers in France are anxious to abolish the corruption fund entirely or to provide some means of intelligent control, but the attempt has been made twice before and has failed in spite of the most scandalous exposures. The first is known as the Boulanger incident. When the General came to the ministry of war, he found a large fund awaiting him, it having been allowed by his economical predecessors to accumulate. During his administration, appeared a libelous satire on his old opponent, Duc d' Aumale. This book, called The Honor of the Orleans Family, was showily gotten up and expensively advertised. When its author died, shortly afterward, his papers showed that the minister of war had stood the expenses out of the secret service fund. The Chamber of Deputies attempted to tinker up a law preventing a reoccurrence, but were checkmated by the opposition of the bureaucrats, who needed the funds in their business. Once again it was proved that M. Dupuy, while minister of the interior, had subsidized a newspaper out of the secret service fund for purposes of his own. Again, the institution was assailed, and again it was sustained. Then, as now, the reformers were met by the argument that the enemies of the Republic abroad were rich and reacherous and must be fought with their own weapons.

One run maintained by these secret service funds is that school of "back stairs diplomacy" of which Dr. Leyds and Agoncillo, agents respectively of the Transvaal and the Filipino junta, are the best known exponents. It is the school of underhand and unrecognized agents, who have a perfect understanding with their own governments but hold no credentials with the government on which they work. This style of diplomacy is much favored by the Eastern governments, Turkey and Egypt especially. The Khedive of Egypt is supposed to be a vassal of Turkey and to carry on all his foreign relations through the sublime Porte. He has, consequently, no right to an embassy at any European capital, but he is represented, nevertheless, by unofficial agents. Their task has been mainly to intrigue against the British government. In London they hardly do anything with the party in power, of course, but work systematically with the opposition, sometimes committing them to courses of policy to which they are bound to adhere when the balance of power changes, sometimes encouraging them to block legislation. These agents are generally Levantine bankers, although Englishmen have been found ready and willing to take up the task. In past times, when Egyptian politics were more lively than at present, immense sums have been squandered by the Khedival government in this manner. Turkey, although accredited with regular representatives at the Europeancapitals, is in this business heavily.

Even reputable governments are not above this sort of diplomacy, however. For a long time England kept at the Vatican an unofficial representative in the person of Sir John Errington. He did not belong to the government service at all, least of all to the diplomatic corps, and the ministers were able to answer with perfect truth in response to Parliamentary inquiries, that they had no official representative at the court of the pope. Nevertheless he was acting for the government, although without pay, unless it came from the secret service fund, but he succeeded in his mission of weaning the Vatican from its Irish home rule leanings and received a baronetcy as a reward.

Leyds and Agoncillo, both of Malay extraction by-the-way, are back-stairs diplomats, but of an isolated type. The governments which they represent are not recognized in the courts of Europe; nevertheless there is a certain sympathy with their respective causes, so that they are given, unofficially, many privileges which are generally credited only to recognized ambassadors or ministers. Of course, this applies to Leyds more than to Agoncillo, in proportion as the cause of the Boer is more popular than that of the Filipino.

SPENSER MASTERS.

The Washington Woman's Club, which makes a point of securing celebrities to address it, found one last week in the person of Montagu White. After expatiating upon his favorite theme—the wickedness of England—he closed by informing the several hundred ladies present that woman's place was at home and she had all the rights that were good for her. There was considerable opposition by the members of the club, who were somewhat restrained by the fact that Mr. White was their guest, but if he could have heard what they said when his back was turned he would have wished himself at home with his brother Boers.

Thirty-one persons are on trial at Elberfeld in Germany for fraudulent evasion of military service. The chief culprit was a cigar drummer who died in detention before the trial, and seems to have had a "pull" with the examiners. His trade was among well-to-do people, as he charged several thousand marks for exemption. This was brought about by drugging the young men before the medical examination, so that they showed symptoms of heart or of liver troubles. He had worked with impunity for a dozen years in the towns along the Rhine.

Le Five O'clock is doomed in Paris. At first welcomed as relieving the formality of afternoon receptions it has developed into a gastronomic nuisance. The original tea and cakes by successive additions turned into an elaborate cold lunch, which interfered with dinner. Dinner was put back an hour, but this worked havoc with getting to the theatre in time, and the stage has power enough in France still to put five o'clock teas under the ban.

The potato does not appear to occupy the position which it held some years ago as the staple food of the rural population of Ireland. The comparative cheapness of foreign flour has done much to alter the state of things. "A bit of cakebread and a drop of tay" will be the reply to an inquiry as to the present diet of the poorest peasantry in the country. Even the wholesome Indian meal is ousted from its position by the bread and tea diet. While the potato has decreased in importance as a general article of diet, it is however still in extensive use over a large area of the country.

NEW YORK.

LENTEN DOINGS IN THE METROPOLIS.

IN gay New York, we are enjoying Lent as a season of rest from turmoil and strife or execrating it as a season of forced retirement, according to our enthusiasm for the social game. My friend the rector has been lamenting the fact that the gay worldings are taking the season of penitence less seriously than heretofore. In fact, there is rather more entertaining than there used to be and it is a little more daring. For example, cards used to be tabooed, but card parties are now made one of the ways of whirling away the dull season. Formal entertainments used to be strictly frowned down; people used to meet, quite by accident, and have a good time in an impromptu way, but now we make no bones of a small and early. Nevertheless, I take issue with the rector regarding the observances of Lent. It is being observed just as rigidly as ever, but in a more rational way. The matron who decides to abolish meat from her menage during the forty days and substitutes therefore delicate confections of fish and eggs is not observing the spirit of the season. It is the realization of the fact that hard and fast rules are made to be dodged while the best way of being abstinent is to make your own rules for yourself, which makes this Lent in New York lax in seeming and strict in reality. Heavens, I must have caught some of the spirit myself, for I have preached this whole paragraph long!

A Lenten frolic which made a great deal of fun for the younger set was a "ghost walk," given by Miss Anna Constable at the offices of Howard Constable. It was intended at first that this entertainment should be a sort of historical pageant—"the ghosts of the nineteenth century"—but it became apparent at once that this was too large an undertaking, especially for Lent. Then, I hear that a certain good pastor who has something of a "pull" with Miss Constable set his foot down on the entire proceeding. The end of the matter was that they decided to have ghosts, just any old ghost; if you wanted to be an 1830 ghost or a "Trelawny" ghost, so much the better; if not, you could come in a shroud. This was a blessing, because people who had historical nineteenth century costumes left over from the Bradley-Martin ball took them down and wore them without more ado or trouble, and those that hadn't threw costumes together out of sheets. There were a few anachronisms committed; certain people wore the knee-breeches and patches of the eighteenth century, but these had their uses. The costumes of the earlier part of the past century, whether they be the stiff styles of the Empire period or the awful pokes of 1830 or the wide hoop-skirts of the Trelawny time, are mightily ugly, so that the dainty garb of the eighteenth century gave relief to the eye. It was an informal affair, though a large one, and the company, seizing the spirit, made it a very merry time. Some of the vaudeville "stunts" with which the guests sought to liven the occasion, were a bit old and stiff, but they were forgiven in the general gaiety of the whole performance.

Some unknown genius, whose name has not yet been revealed, came as a "Dago" organ-grinder with a monkey. So perfect was his make-up, that the others took him for the genuine article and pretty generally avoided him. He furnished music for two or three very pretty little turns, among them an Italian dance by Miss Angelica Church and Miss Ethel Stebbins. Three others who succeeded in concealing their identity—for there was no unmasking—were a pair of American Indians and an extremely realistic headless ghost, who carried the missing member under his arm. Then there was a band of banshees and ghouls, with long, artificial arms and necks, who did a dance with the headless spectre under green lights. Philip Birkhead, Robert G. Cook and Charles Riker were in this band. Mrs. de Castro was made up for little Eva, and convulsed the company by rendering "Twinkle, twinkle, little star." 'Twas a merry band of spectres, barring the banshees, and a very gay time.

But little more will be a-doing this Lent. Most of the heaviest entertainers are out of town, anyway, whiling the season of penitence and retirement at the southern resorts or the country clubs. At Virginia Hot Springs there are some promiscuous Vanderbilts, the H. McK. Twombleys, the Seward Webbs, "and others." Mrs. Stuyvesant Fish, the most active entertainer in New York of late, has been sojourning in Florida with the Pierpont Morgans. On the American Riviera, by the way, it is the most crowded season ever known. At Miami, the overflow of guests had to be housed in a church for several days, while the Palm Beach was so crowded on J. Pierpont Morgan's arrival that he was obliged to remain in his private car for several nights.

It being Lent, there is not supposed to be anything new in clothes, nor would there be were it not for the stage, which does not tone down during the forty days. In the new play at Daly's, for example, Mary Mannering and Hilda Spong both wear princesse dinner-gowns of gracious make. Miss Mannering's is in white mousseline de soie embroidered in gold beads. This embroidery is in long lines, falling unbroken from the top of the bodice to the very hem. On the bodice, gold beads are set in an intricate pattern so close that they form an almost solid mass. This becomes really solid at the waist, where they give the impression of a golden belt. From the waist, the long lines of embroidery diverge until they are quite eighteen inches apart. There is a long straight line of chiffon down the front of this skirt, giving the impression that topens over an underskirt. There is a narrow collar of chiffon and tiny sleeves of the same. One word about the wearer; perpendicular lines conceal stoutness and Miss Mannering—alas that I must say it!—is not so slim as in the days gone by when she played "Trelawney."

Hilda Spong's costume is liberty crepe de Chine and violet in color. The fit is perfect. To the depth of half a yard, the skirt is embroidered in purple beads, lightened with spangles of the same tint. Similarly, the bodice is bordered, from the top down, in the beads and spangles of the skirt. There is a simple drapery of violet maline over the bust and arms, caught at one shoulder by a bunch of purple orchids. The glove-fitting front blends into a back which sweeps outward in long, graceful folds. Being one of the simplest gowns of the season, it is yet one of the best-made and most beautiful.

IN OLD VALPARAISO

First Stage of the "Hartford's" Training Course.

TO THE land lubber who has never been at sea it may seem strange that one of Uncle Sam's war ships could cruise for fifty-five days and not have at least a goodly portion of the time hang heavy on the hands of everyone who happened to be aboard her. A visit however to one of these fighting crafts while enroute between ports would convince him that even a bee hive is idle by comparison.

The remodeled cruiser Hartford has just finished a fifty-five day run between San Francisco and Valparaiso and there has not been a minute wasted from the time the ship passed out through the heads till her ground tackle was hooked on to the bottom of Valparaiso bay. In the case of the Hartford, work was a prime necessity, for her mission is to transform three hundred landsmen into full-fledged sailors in the least possible time. These fifty-five days were of much value to the proposition for they have given ample opportunity not only for study but practical illustration of the methods taught. So well have Captain Hawley and his officers succeeded in the work allotted that through the means of a rigid examination of their youngsters it is proven that two-thirds of them are already fitted for the rank of ordinary seamen. This result means a heap of work not only on the part of the candidates for sailor honors, but also on the part of the officers who have communicated most of the instruction by means of a personal handling of the men. It is a new system, this which is in vogue on board Farragut's former flagship, but so thorough are its effects that already before it has been in operation more than a few months it has proved its efficiency and will certainly take its place among the practical methods of recruiting the navy.

On the long voyage there were few incidents outside the ship to attract the attention of the youngsters; in fact from the time when the famous old vessel dropped over the horizon to the westward of the Golden Gate not a sail was sighted with one exception until within four hundred miles of Valparaiso. But with all that hardly a day passed in which there did not occur something out of the ordinary to interest and in many cases to instruct these lads.

There was one telling example of honors to be gained by faithful service on board of Columbia's fleets. It so happened that among the seamen assigned to the Hartford were several who served with Dewey in the historic battle at Manila. A few hours before we sailed there came from Washington a Medal of Honor for each one of these veterans, which Captain Hawley took the first muster day as the proper opportunity to present to them. The members of the sailor kindergarten stood at attention as the captain called to the front those who were entitled to the decoration and after congratulations on their work aboard Dewey's fleet personally pinned on each breast the bronze medal which will always be a mark of bravery and efficiency in service. On one bright day when the Hartford was within the realm which is assigned to old Neptune and which lies between two degrees north and two degrees south of the equator there was a whirl of excitement, for, true to the teachings of sailor lore, Neptunus Rex, accompanied by his spouse Amphitrite, and all the members of his bedraggled court, appeared aboard ship. Sailor men of all navies stick close to this ancient custom and all officers humor them in their day of sport which comes with the crossing of the line. The Neptunic court is formed of the oldest sea dogs aboard and their make-ups for the occasion are weird in the extreme. For the time being the sea king becomes commander of the ship and his court attaches see to it that every one aboard who has never passed through his domain either pays tribute or falls into the hands of the royal barber, doctor and other dignitaries of the watery court. In most cases the ship's officers pay tribute while the jackies take their medicine, after which the old monarch declares everyone aboard to be full-fledged citizens of his realm and issues to them certificates as such. It has seldom happened that a ship carried into Nep's domain so many candidates for the barber's attention as faced the Ruler of the Raging Main on board the Hartford. It was a busy day with the court attendants and when night came the census of his realm was increased by nearly four hundred souls. And what a time it was for real downright sailor play. Not a man escaped and those who tried to do so found that they fared worse than those who came to the front willingly. Drills there were none while Neptune was aboard, for it was a day of festivity in every sense.

Of all the three hundred western boys aboard the cruiser not one had seen a shark. Several showed it when, as they were towing a target back to the ship, a big fellow hovered round the boat and poked his nose against its sides. But they got even with the shark family when a few days later the cruiser, being under sail, fell in with a calm. Then the sharks appeared and two fell victims to a desire for salt pork. When the first came over the rail every man aboard seemed to have a grudge against him, for it became necessary to defend the carcass while an attempt was made to photograph it.

There were three days when it did not take any urging to send the men to quarters. These were target practice days. How the youngsters did revel in the actual use of the Hartford's batteries. They showed, too, that there is a heap of material for first class marksmen aboard Farragut's former flagship. Their shots tore the target with splintering shells and left it a floating wreck.

The event of all the run to the Chilean coast was a call at the island where Alexander Selkirk passed his long imprisonment and gave to Defoe the foundation for Robinson Crusoe. The cruiser stopped at Juan Fernandez for a few hours while beef was bought from the residents, and Cumberland Bay was sounded for fresh fish. When they had visited this spot and had a run on the beach the youngsters began to believe that they were really on the way to see the world. It was their first sight of a foreign shore and happened to be a spot with which every one of them was thoroughly familiar.

Now they have seen Valparaiso, and the principal ports of South America will follow, while their education is advancing and the time rapidly approaching when they will leave the training service and become men o' war's men in reality.

BABBLINGS OF A BELLE

ONLY one more week of Lent, my dear Diary. But this will be really a very difficult one for all of us. Even the least religious take Holy Week quite seriously. I love it myself. In fact I think it one of the few times during the year that one has the opportunity of hearing good church music. The "Ideal" and I intend visiting all the churches, to see which looks the prettiest and in which we shall hear the most beautiful voices. Of course I have had to get a new gown and hat for Easter. The straw is a very pale yellow, almost real straw color. It is soft and braided in a fancy sort of way, and has some lace and tulle and pink roses and black velvet on it and is turned up a little on one side. The "Ideal" likes it. I always wear gray on Easter Sunday, and, as I should have had a gray gown in my trousseau, I have bought one of a sort of crepey material. I think the gowns this year are lovely. I just wish you could see my trousseau. Of course, when I am married I shall tell you of it. Helen Thomas, too, is getting lovely things. Then there is Emily Hager. Walter Dean and she will be married in about three weeks. I am very glad, for I know they will be tremendously happy and I am sure will entertain a great deal. I quite envy the Deans getting Emily into their family. Mama says she is the superior of almost any girl she has ever met. She is very intelligent in the first place and cultivated and kind and really responsive, and will indeed grace Walter's house. Walter is a dear, jolly fellow. I really believe Emily will get as many cups as I have, for she is so popular. I should not mind, but I really believe my "Ideal" would prefer me to be the most popular bride of the season.

The "Ideal" is now quite "golf" mad. Last week the "sticks" that he sent to Scotland for arrived, and mama said I must really try to interest myself in the game. We went out, and I made some capital shots. Since then, day after day, we spend hours on the links, and I like it, especially these days when we are having this gorgeous spring weather, and seeing our dear old Presidio at its very best. Leila says she does not think Southern California nearly so beautiful as the North. Everything here is so much more luxuriant; they have such a scarcity of rain there, and outside of Los Angeles the hotels I believe have such wretched tables. I could never persuade the "Ideal" to go where there is a poor table. He will take his own chef with him. You know he has hired a private car for the two of us for six weeks so we can go where we like and get good food all the time. I hope I shall not get terribly tired of the "Ideal's" company. I know so many people everywhere that I do not believe I shall.

But to return to "golf." I am hearing on all sides that our girls are playing a so much stronger and swifter game than their Eastern sisters. Some of them make really good strokes. Alice Mullins does well. She has improved materially in this last year; so have Caro Crockett and Florence Ives. All the girls who play are most enthusiastic, and take it quite as seriously as I do marriage, so you can understand 'tis no bagatelle to them. Alice Hoffman is the best player on the Coast; she plays just like a man; the "Ideal" and I always watch her to get the stroke if possible. It will be a long day before he fetches home any cups. I, perhaps, am luckier, for no matter what I do, somehow I astonish people, especially in games. I play billiards, Arthur says, as he has never seen any other girl. I know in hotels men always stand around to watch me, and lots of fellows who do not like to be beaten will not take a cue if I am to be in the game. They insist they do not like to be worsted by a girl.

San Rafael this year is to be quite popular; the hotel is refusing people and all the cottages have been taken. I hope the links will be put in good order, for at present they are pretty badly in need of attention. The Boardmans have taken a large house and will entertain a good deal. Mrs. Boardman has always such nice girls staying with her, and you know Sam is always as nice and considerate as when one first meets him. The Smiths will occupy their own house, so I suppose there will be lots of driving and riding and general good times. People who have cottages in Sausalito, Ross and Belvedere are going over there this month. Really, April and May are the two loveliest months in the country. Nothing is dried up then, and the mornings are not too warm. Just as soon as I am married my family will go somewhere to try to obtain consolation for my loss. I suppose it is worse really for those who are left behind.

Now, I must tell you what I have been doing. Of course on Monday last I went to Paderewski's concert. How I wish I could live in a place where I could get the chance of hearing good music and singing often. There is nothing that gives me more pleasant sensations than just closing my eyes and getting all the real delight of Paderewski at the piano. He is a wonder. I like Madame Paderewski ever so much. She is so charming and sweet, and then when one realizes that she is the one who has helped him, who has buoyed him up when he was not appreciated, as he is now, one cannot help liking her. You know Madame Paderewski was the Countess Rosen, who first suggested to this young man, whom she knew, that he would be a great pianist if he would work. He toiled for years. Then he played in Berlin and was hissed. He wished to give it up, but his good angel saw he would eventually be great. He was most ambitious, and as we all know was rewarded.

Mary Crocker and Mary Scott leave for Europe very soon. All the girls envy them so. They will enjoy themselves tremendously. Helen Hopkins gave Mary Scott a farewell dinner on Friday evening. We had a nice time, and toasted the departing guest in all sorts of way. The Taylor boys, Bobbie Eyre, Bert Cadwalader, Fred McNear and Harry Poett were the men; Caro Crockett, Therese Morgan, the Hopkinses, Mary Scott and I the girls. So you see we were all very great friends, so it was pretty jolly. Mrs. Nuttall had a large euchre party on Friday afternoon. It was very nice, mama said, but she did not get a prize, so she was not in so good a humor as I would have liked. Leila, however, said she had a fine time, and the refreshments were delicious. Leila always knows what interests her little sister. Ruth McNutt had a luncheon in honor of Helen Thomas Friday. Ruth becomes more stunning-looking all the time. Edith Preston was there and looked well; so did Linda Cadwalader. I am devoted to Linda and Bert. They will be some of my first guests when I have a house of my own. Both the Thomas girls looked well. I like Helen best, though I admire Mollie's appearance more, she is so aristocratic-looking. When I am having Eastern men to dinner I shall always invite Mollie Thomas and Sara Collins. I have never heard of any man who did not admire them immensely. The Hopkinses give a luncheon to Helen Thomas this week. Miss Alice Klein gave a large tea to Mary Scott on Saturday. The Hopkinses, Carrie Taylor, the Morgans and several others helped her to receive. Mrs. Dean is busy preparing for an engagement tea to Emily Hager on the 17th. Mrs. Dean's entertainments are generally so elaborate, I know we shall have an affair that we shall talk about for days afterwards. The Hirsh girls of Fruitvale give a luncheon to Florence Sharm of Piedmont after Lent.

I know we shall have lots of fun in the near future, for with the weddings, theatre parties and small dinners it will seem like a second part of a very gay season. Now, Diary dear, I think I've told you all the news of this week.

MISS CRICKETT.

A pretty wedding took place last Thursday in Sausalito, when Mr. Cecil Ernest Hodgson and Miss Florence Cassius Roberts were married. The church was beautifully decorated in Cherokee roses and wild flowers, and afterwards a reception was held at Mrs. Cousen's, Miss Roberts's sister's house.

The engagement is announced of Miss Edith Longley Chisholm and William R. Green. Miss Chisholm is a sister of Mrs. Percy Haslett of Alameda, and an exceedingly nice girl. Will Green is a son of Harry Green of Monterey. They will be married on April 17th.

If you have not tried Roe's Belfast Ginger Ale, you have yet to enjoy the most delicious of beverages.

DECADENCE OF THE CHURCH CHOIR.

DOES it pay to sing? The question is sharply suggested by the present glut in the local market of voices, and more especially of the female voice. With male choirs rapidly usurping the place of the mixed quartette, as at Grace Church, St. Luke's, St. John's, the Advent, St. Ignatius and lesser churches, the field becomes practically closed to women. The First Unitarian long ago dispensed with a costly choir, and with the recently discharged quartette of St. Patrick's added to the list of unemployed, there are suggestions in the future of panic, that might well drive the ambitious warbler to the type-writer or sewing-machine.

A glance backward a decade or so shows music to have been in a most flourishing condition, and gives rise to the inference that our jayness must have increased along with the population. About fifteen years ago boom conditions were reached, when Mrs. Mariner Campbell sang at the Unitarian Church for a consideration of $100 per month. Ben Clark, the tenor received $75, the alto and bass respectively $40 and $50. The average salary was $60 running to $100, and in the way that retrospection adds glamor to what has become dimly remote, we are told that the singers were worthy their hire, and that we do not grow any such voices in these days of decadence. There were then three or four really dramatic singers, who had drifted out from the East, superbly equipped as to voice, and saturated with all the traditions of oratorio. One of these singers of that gilded past in giving the above data, says there are no dramatic sopranos—no full-voiced, broad-toned oratorio singers among native San Franciscans. This is attributed to the catarrhal climate, which destroys all resonance and gives a thin light tone incapable of broad effects—according to this authority.

The decline in values dates to ten years ago when prices went below the $60 mark, and steadily dropped until the present bed rock conditions were reached. With two or three exceptions, where fine salaries still are paid, most of the churches alternate between $15 and nothing—the latter being the favorite terms for musical services. An instance was told of a thoroughly capable soprano who accepted a Christmas engagement in a Catholic church. After attending three rehearsals and the Christmas service, she was handed $3. Often, acceptable voices can be found among students for a nominal sum, but it is not surprising that the more advanced singers, they who have spent valuable years of their lives in expensive drill, prefer retirement and the more substantial returns of teaching to the doubtful compliment of being asked to sing for nothing, and at the same time being placed side by side with the unblushing mediocrity given a first place. Gratuitous music has been made so much a matter of course by the persistent striving of ignorant and ambitious beginners, that it has become well nigh impossible for a legitimate musician to earn a dollar, much less a living, except at teaching, where he sometimes gets a chance to turn the tables on mistaken vanity.

The manager of a Western Addition [illegible] states that he has more offers of music that he can use. The "Vermonters" do things in a munificent way that is all their own and distinctly New England in manner. The person wishing to appear before that organization must first give a gratuitous performance, that the audience may test his quality without compromising themselves financially. If the audience can stand it the person is said to have made a hit, and is engaged for a succeeding performance at the rate of $5. This has a flavor of yankee "nearness" dashed with Scotch caution that is only less exhilarating than a mint julep. One might imagine the "Vermonters" would not be overrun with application on such terms, but thus far they have never failed of material to fill out the

A Young Girl

May be very old in suffering. She is very apt to neglect the earlier symptoms of disease. Often when she takes treatment it is the wrong treatment for her case. Very many young women write to Dr. Pierce and consult him by letter free. All such correspondence is strictly private, and womanly modesty is spared the shock of indelicate examinations, unpleasant questionings and offensive local treatments.

"I suffered with female trouble," writes Miss Agnes McGowne, of 1221 Bank St., Washington, D. C. "I tried various remedies but none seemed to do any permanent good. The doctors said it was the worse case of internal trouble they ever had. I decided to write to Doctor Pierce for help. I received a very encouraging reply and commenced treatment at once. I had not used the "Favorite Prescription" a week before I began to feel better, and, as I continued, my health gradually improved. It is improving every day and I still continue to take the medicine.

IN BOOKDOM

SOME years ago (1885) Professor A. S. Cook reprinted in this city a series of papers upon the philosophy of literature, by George Henry Lewes, whose fame is associated in the popular mind with that of his wife, "George Eliot." The pamphlet, I believe, was used by Professor Cook as a text-book in his university classes. I wish to quote a significant paragraph from these old Fortnightly essays. Mr. Lewes has been speaking of the worthlessness of second-hand material to the artist—the worthlessness of ideas of life drawn not from life itself but from books, which are other men's ideas of life; of landscapes painted not from nature but from other men's interpretations of nature. He goes on to say:

"The value of the tidings brought by literature is determined by their authenticity. At all times the air is noisy with rumors, but the real business of life is transacted on clear insight and authentic speech. False tidings and idle rumors may for an hour clamorously usurp attention because they are believed to be true; but the cheat is soon discovered, and the rumor dies. In like manner literature which is unauthentic may succeed as long as it is believed to be true: that is, so long as our intellects have not discovered the falseness of its pretensions, and our feelings have not disowned sympathy with its expressions. Writers have seldom any steadfast conviction that it is of primary necessity for them to deliver tidings about what they themselves have seen and felt. Perhaps their intimate consciousness assures them that what they have seen and felt is neither new nor important. It may not be new, it may not be intrinsically important; nevertheless, if authentic, it has its value, and a far greater value than anything reported by them at second-hand. We cannot demand from every man that he have unusual depth of insight or exceptional experience; but we demand of him that he give us of his best, and his best cannot be another's. The facts seen through the vision of another, reported on the witness of another, may be true, but the reporter cannot vouch for them. Let the original observer speak for himself. Otherwise only rumors are set afloat."

I have quoted these words for the purpose of applying them to "a novel of today" by Herbert Flowerdew, called The Realist. Mr. Flowerdew has rather peculiar ideas, drawn from books, it would seem, or at least inspired, as to the term "realism." Ordinarily, I believe, the term is applied to the analytical methods whereby the writer produces certain effects, and not to any alleged laboratory methods of procuring knowledge in the human emotions. In other words, the term is an art term, and not an educational one. It is concerned directly with the psychological effect upon the reader of certain methods of treating literary material. It is concerned only indirectly with the manner in which that material is collected. A man may spend a lifetime in the slum or the palace with his note-book. He will be a realist when he writes a realistic novel, and not before. Mr. Flowerdew has heard differently. He has heard that a realist is a collector of data, a sort of vivisectionist, a monster, a Mr. Hyde who tramples down children in order to get the exact note of their treble terror, an inhuman chemist who lacerates the emotions with his fiery acids in order to be sure about the re-action. He has "set rumors afloat."

The plot of The Realist turns upon the power of the "realistic" novelist Zant over a young reporter who comes in his way. Zant, speaking to this young man of his attitude toward women, and toward his fellow-beings, thus expounds his ideas about art:

"'To obtain mastery over the minds of men, which I admit frankly is my one ambition, it is necessary to differentiate oneself from them by wanting nothing. Can we describe a fight when we are fighting? Can we watch a game and at the same time take part in it? For the purposes of my books I have to win love sometimes.'

"The perfect indifference with which he spoke chilled his listener. For the first time he felt that the man was a fiend. Zant's face without changing grew saturnine in his eyes. The strangling story came back vividly to his mind, together with a desire to startle the man who seemed to hold himself superior to every human emotion.

"'You think your work justifies you in doing anything,' he said abruptly. 'Is it true that you strangled your housekeeper?'

"If he had expected the man's placid colorless face to show even as much as annoyance at the question, he was disappointed.

"'O yes, it is true,' he said indifferently. 'I have seen it stated that I performed the experiment in order to describe the effects of strangulation. That is scarcely true, for I knew it already. My idea was chiefly to try how much pacification would be necessary to make the poor creature my friend again. I was writing about women who live with men that beat and almost kill them. Not that all my experiments are undertaken on behalf of my books. My one delight in life is to play on the human instrument, and to get from it any effect I please.'"

The reporter is horrified, and says:

"'But you cannot disregard consequences. If you had quite strangled the woman on whom you tried your experiment, you would have been hanged, whatever your object was.'

"'Possibly,' said Zant. 'I rather look forward to trying my powers of persuasion upon a jury in defense of my life. It would be a new experience. You would like my idea of art? I am described as a realist. My method is to plan out a dramatic story as the idealist does, and reconstruct its leading positions artificially in order to describe them with the realist's fidelity. If I introduce a case of slow poisoning, a doctor of course could give me the symptoms. Most novelists—even those who describe themselves as realists—are content with that. I should poison a man, and watch him studiously, living with him and sharing his thoughts. I did so in writing La Femme. Frequently I give every moment of a whole month to the reconstruction of a single scene in one of my books. At the present moment I am endeavoring to reconstruct a dramatic scene in which a man morally innocent realizes that by a mistake he has actually committed a crime for which the law will exact a heavy penalty. To clear himself is impossible. I am uncertain how he will act, and it will probably take me a week to submit the question to the test of an experiment."

The story follows the course of this experiment. The reporter is most fiendishly played upon in his fears, his love, his ambitions, during that melodramatic week. He becomes the hero of desperate adventures, that turn out in the end to be merely harmless experiments. He is made to believe that both he and the girl he loves are in the power of Zant. He is goaded in the end to shoot Zant, as he thinks, and is tortured by the anticipations of his trial for murder. The cartridge turns out to have been blank. Zant completes his novel from the data he has gathered, gives the girl a dowry, and sets up the reporter in business. There isn't any moral. Published by John Lane, New York.

The Nicaragua Canal, by W. E. Simmons, which has just been published by Harper & Bros., apparently is one of the F. Tennyson Neely manuscripts from last year. It is still timely, however, and contains a great deal of interesting matter about Nicaragua and the Central American region, as well as much (it must be confessed) that is not so interesting. I cannot be quite sure from his book that Mr. Simmons ever personally visited the country. Probably he has personal knowledge of it; but the most of his material might have been collected in any good library, and there is so much padding, historical, legendary, and otherwise, incorporated into his pages, all of which certainly did come from some good library, that it is difficult to speak as to the author's intimate personal experiences in the land of civil wars. There are a number of interesting plates, including a very suggestive one of five ruined dredges in Graytown harbor, and another one of the mouth of the canal in the same harbor. There is not, however, a great deal of definite information, either about the work that has been done or that which is yet to do upon the waterway. The pictures of native life and customs are perhaps of most interest.

I have before me a story for boys from the Macmillan Company, New York, called Soldier Rigdale. Beulah Marie Dix is the author. The tale is placed early in the history of our country—indeed, it begins on the ship Mayflower—and the hero is an orphan boy. This boy, Miles Rigdale, has all kinds of experiences in the new colony of Plymouth. He ends by running away with his little sister. The runagates are found by the Indians, and are recovered by Captain Miles Standish and his good band of pilgrims. Standish adopts the orphaned boy into his own home, and he grows up to be a right strong soldier. The book contains a great many interesting episodes and some good pictures of early colonial life on the New England coast.

If a young lady were to spend half a day among the bargain books she would have a hard time selecting a more conventional novel than The Judgment of Helen, Thomas Cobb being the author of the same; for it is out and out a love story, with the usual impediments to the course of true love, and the usual triumph of the lovers. "Helen Christopherson's was the beauty of the budding rose," we are told of the heroine. She had "a fair skin, bright blue eyes, a wholesome color, and a wealth of hair which was not quite dark enough to be red, though it was much too dark to be golden." This unusual young woman was engaged to be married to a millionaire merchant—Sir Thomas Lipton, I guess. Her mother had persuaded her into the match. He bought her diamond necklaces and gold watches and silver dressing-sets and other expensive gifts, but she did not love him. Instead she loved a young medical student. One week in the country—this is all happening in England, of course—the merchant prince ran down to see his future wife for a few days. The medical student was also there on a visit. And there was a poor relation, one Patty Winter, who "possessed a pair of fine dark eyes," and whose "face was a little pale, but not from delicate health, broad at the forehead, short, and almost pointed at the chin"—a heart-shaped face. Her nose "was small and indefinite, the mouth being rather large." Her dresses "always fitted her a little loosely, perhaps because her form was slight." Nevertheless, it "possessed attractive curves." This young woman was a schoolma'am. As for the medical student, Maurice Vaughan by name, he was "tall, sparely built, with smooth, fairish hair, and an alert, shaven face." He wore "a brown homespun suit which Mrs. Christopherson, who was in the habit of noticing such details, perceived had already done duty during previous seasons." It was the intention of Mrs. Christopherson to make a match of it between schoolma'am Patty and Doctor Maurice.

It was bound to happen. The millionaire, who was "tall, broad at the waist and hips," with "dark hair, thin on the crown," and "features, though regular, a little blunt and heavy," eyes "small, but not too close together, forehead high, cheeks somewhat puffy," arrived in due season and was promptly snubbed by the heroine, his fiancee. The next thing anyone knows he marries the schoolma'am, the heroine marries her doctor, and Mrs. Christopherson, foiled in her plans, marries a new husband of her own from the peerage. Published by John Lane, New York.

An Old Story.

I was nineteen, she twenty-eight,
When first I saw her lovely face,
Her fairy form of lissome grace.
I knew that I had met my fate
When, as I saw her golden hair,
Her carmine lip, her cobalt eye,
I muttered, with a furnace sigh,
"Ye gods, but she is passing fair!"

She twenty-eight and I nineteen!
I took to gloves and neckties bright
To find more favor in her sight.
Of my affections she was queen;
Alternate hope and dark dispair
Would mount or rankle in my breast;
She spoiled a good deal of my rest—
I said that she was passing fair.

She twenty-eight, I twenty-eight!
I see the powder on her face;
Her form has angles more than grace,
Her eyes are blue, but not quite straight.
I really thought my love would last,
But fleeting years will love impair,
I thought that she was passing fair—
And so she was—but now she's past.

What Are Club Cocktails?

"A MODERN ECSTASY" is a Shakespearian definition for a "Cocktail." "Kings it makes gods, and meaner creatures kings."

Wherever good livers are found, wherever conviviality exists, even to the most remote corners of the earth, the "CLUB COCKTAIL" reigns supreme as a fashionable drink.

The "CLUB COCKTAILS" never vary; they are always the same. The secret of their perfect blend is that they are kept six months before being drawn off and bottled.

"Cocktails" that are served over the bar do not contain these indispensable qualities.

Seven Varieties: Manhattan, Martini, Vermouth, Holland Gin, York, Tom Gin, Whisky.

A FREAK OF LUCK.

"WOULDN'T that bump you!" murmured the faro dealer reflectively, as a thin pock-marked man passed the corner of Broadway and Thirty-eighth street.

"What's that?" asked the race follower.

"Seein' you throw the frapped countenance up against Hennessy. Say, wasn't you feedin' him couple years ago, when I seen you down i' New Orleans?"

"Say," said the race man, "d'y' ever hear how me and Hennessy came together, an' what happened to both of us?"

"Nope."

"Well, it's a queer story, and it goes to show what a freaky thing luck is. We couldn't ever trot double. If Hennessy is flying high, I'm cold broke, an' if I'm a winner, Hennessy's on the pork. Besides, he never could stay square with a friend no how."

"Well, how about it," asked the faro man.

"It was after the season closed at Brighton Beach in '97. Hennessy had been up against it for four long, warm, weary months. He'd been playin' everythin' in the business from favorites to 100 to 1 shots, an' he couldn't win breakfast money. I'd been foll'in' the Western circuit all summer an' had nursed up quite a wad, an' when I came back to New York the first man I run against is Hennessy. He was comin' out of a Sixth avenue beanery, where they sell coffee for two cents a cup, an' say, if ever any man looked like a bad nickel, it was Hennessy. I'd seen him when he was rollin' high out in California, an' I had a few drinks with him then, an' some guy had told me that Hennessy was a man 'at never stood by his friends. But say, I was sorry to see a man down on his luck, an' I says to myself, I'll help him to take a brace. So I fits him out from feet to finish, an' then I promises him $5 a day for two weeks to play the ponies—me layin' off a while to rest.

"Well, after a few days Hennessy begins to do business again, and inside of a month had nursed together a little wad of about three hundred dollars.

"'Now,' says I, 'we're off to New Orleans.'

"An' we went an' started into the game the next day. But Hennessy's luck had changed again, and there wasn't anything he could win. Neither of us could make it out. Hennessy said he'd gone into the theatre with his umbrella up, an' I guess p'haps that's what it was, but, anyway, he was a dead one from that on, and in two days he didn't have but $50 in the world. Then I told him to stick to me and follow my plays, an' he did, and in two days I had lost $1,700 an' all of Hennessy's $50 was gone. So I give Hennessy $10 to start fresh on an' told him to lay his own money an' keep away from me. So he did and lost every nickel of it before night.

"Well, it was up to me to take care of him. So he goes off and gets a little more somewhere, and every mornin' he's 'round to my room for breakfast money and I'm givin' him $3 to feed himself and play with. That kept up the whole winter through, me givin' him $3 every day, besides drinks an' cigars, an' laundry bills, and every now and then a tenner to get his stuff out that he'd hocked. But I guess it was luck to me, because I lived high every minute of the time and quit the game $3,000 better than when Hennessy and me started South.

"I guess Hennessy thought the same thing, 'cause he comes 'round one morning and says if I'll stake him to a little roll he'll quit me and try his luck on the Western circuit. So I gave him $500, and he started for Chicago. It wasn't long before we heard of his luck, and my five hundred begins to come back.

"Good? Why things just swam his way. I was glad of it, although I wasn't doing so well myself. As Hennessy's stock went up mine started to slump, and pretty soon I was in the hole up to my neck. When the meeting closed it left me stone broke, with only one suit of clothes left and livin' in a hall room near the corner of Ninth avenue and Thirty-second street. Then I began playin' the poolrooms with what money I could borrow here and there, but I couldn't get enough ahead to make any kind of a play, and I began to think if things didn't come my way I'd have to quit the game and go to work."

"Say, wouldn't that bump you?" said the faro man.

"Well, about this time one day," resumed the race follower, "I was coming down Broadway, feeling pretty sore and mean and raggy. I'd had nothing for breakfast but butter cakes and coffee, and I didn't just know who was going to stake me for dinner, let alone a dollar or so just to try if my luck had begun to change. Well, while I was feelin' this way, not exactly sure if I wouldn't chuck the whole business and chase a job, who do I run against but Hennessy. He was just coming out of Martin's with a toothpick sticking out of his jaw and a look on his face like he was full up to the chin with green turtle soup and baked trout and roasted canvasback and nesserole pudding, with a pint of champagne, and a pousse cafe at the end of all. Say, it made me hungry just to look at his mug, and he was wearin' a hot silker an' a long coat and a diamond lamp fit to knock an eye out of the Prince of Wales, and, say, when I saw Hennessy that way I thought it was like findin' a mine. There was ready money all over him."

"An' of course, he staked you good and plenty?" said the faro man.

"Did I say that Hennessy had a pint?" mused the race follower. "Well, maybe it was two of them and maybe it was three. Anyway, Hennessy had a little skate on. It wasn't enough to excuse him and it was just enough to make a mean man nasty.

"'Hello, Hennessy,' says I.

"'Hello,' says Hennessy.

"And I saw then and there that my gold mine was a frost. Hennessy was givin' me the go-by. But I was too hard up to be haughty, so I stops him.

"'Say, Hennessy,' says I, 'are you goin' to walk past a man like that? Don't you know me?"

"'Yes,' says Hennessy, with a kind of an ugly grin. 'I know you well enough.'

"'I've been in hard luck since I saw you. Hennessy," says I. 'I'm on the hog for fair—stone broke, old man!"

"'That don't surprise me,' says Hennessy. 'not a bit.'

"'It don't!' says I, and you can bet I was surpised if he wasn't.

"'Not a particle,' says Hennessy, 'you went broke when I quit you, because I was your mascot. You stole my luck, damn you, and I figure that you owe me about $5,000. The minute I left you things came my way.'

"Well I tried to laugh. 'Why, Hennessy, old man,' says I, 'you're stringin' me. D'ye take me for a hoodoo?'

"'That's what I do,' he says, 'the worst blank-blanked hoodoo this side of the Rocky Mountains.'

"'Well, say, Hennessy,' says I, 'stake me for a hundred and let it go at that?'

"'Not a blanked nickel,' says Hennessy. 'you got my luck once, but you don't get it again, see!'

"Then he turned back into the cafe, and I could see him through the window ordering a new quart."

"Wouldn't that bump you!" said the faro man.

"Say, isn't luck about the queerest thing on earth?" continued the race man, philosophically. "Here was Hennessy, a tramp only a year before, when I was a high rider. Now, I'm on my uppers, and Hennessy's on the wave, and yet at that very minute my luck was on the turn. I walked around the corner where I could curse Hennessy on the quiet and there, in a little heap of wet dirt by the curbstone, I saw something shining. I picked it up. It was a five-dollar gold piece, and there was a hole in it. Say, do you remember me comin' into your bank with it?"

"Sure," said the faro man.

"Say, it needed a lot of nerve to lay the whole five on one card and me hungry too, but I was afraid if I'd break the five I'd break my luck, see?"

The faro man saw.

"So I laid it in one bet, and won ten times running. Then I called the turn, and finally quit $4,000 winner. Say, that was about the dizziest game I ever played, and when I cashed in you bet I went and eat the best dinner that the Tenderloin afforded.

"Well, I didn't see anything more of Hennessy until January, when I went to New Orleans again with a small interest in a string of good ones and another interest in a combination book that a guy named Shorty Allen was running. I was riding high again, and Hennessy wasn't. It did seem queer, but it looked like we both couldn't do business at the same time. I ran against him several times and made as if I'd forgotten the three down he gave me in front of Martin's, and at last one day he came sweatin' round to my rooms, lookin' for a tip. One of our horses was entered for seven furlongs on the next day, with about one chance in a million of winning, but Hennessy had an idea in his hat that the race was to be fixed. He didn't know I was interested in the nag, but he did know that I had an inside track with the stable and came to find out which way the cat was goin' to jump.

"'Say, old pal,' he said, 'I've only got $1,000 left and I want to make a big play to-morrow so's to get even again and I can't take any chances. Can't you put me wise?'"

"Say," said the faro man, "wouldn't that bump you?"

"So, I told him to see me an hour before the race," the race follower went on, "and he went away. Say, d'ye think it was up to me to give him any straight tip?"

"After the way he turned you down? Nit!" returned the faro man.

"Well, next day the mare was a five-to-one shot, and about an hour before the race Hennessy came sneaking up.

"'Do I play her?' he says.

"'For all you're worth,' says I.

"'Sure?' he says.

"'Sure,' says I.

"Well, the book that I was interested in was offering a shade better than the others, and Hennessy went against it to the limit. In twenty minutes every nickel he had in the world was laid on my horse. When they were at the post Hennessy sneaked up again.

"'Sure?" he asked.

"I gave him a cold grin and just said 'midlin'.'

"He turned pale and gasped, 'But you said "Sure!"'

"'Oh, well, Hennessy,' I said, 'there's nothing sure. I always thought I was sure of you until you fooled me. The mare might spring a tendon, or run wide, or anything. See?' And something did happen—I'm not sayin' what. Anyway the favorite romped in an easy winner and Hennessy was broke. He's been broke ever since."—N. Y. Sun.

The reader of this paper will be pleased to learn that there is at least one dreaded disease that science has been able to cure in all its stages, and that is Catarrh. Hall's Catarrh Cure is the only positive cure known to the medical fraternity. Catarrh being a constitutional disease, requires a constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure is taken internally, acting directly upon the blood and mucous surfaces of the system, thereby destroying the foundation of the disease, and giving the patient strength by building up the constitution and assisting nature in doing its work. The proprietors have so much faith in its curative powers that they offer One Hundred Dollars for any case that it fails to cure. Send for list of testimonials.

AT THE THEATERS

THE Neill stock company, which is to play out the rest of the season at the California Theatre, opened Monday night in a rather mild play, "A Bachelor's Romance," and scored a decidedly favorable impression. It is a company of artists who "go in" for quiet methods, and is most welcome after the flash and glitter of the Frawleys. Judging from the first night, there are the weak spots unavoidable in any stock organization, but the ensemble is remarkably consistent. The greatest virtues of the combination, taken as a composite whole, are good taste and conscientiousness and the greatest fault a lack of force. Subdued acting seems to be Mr. Neill's hobby; he has drilled this into his company, frequently at the expense of interest and brightness.

The play is comparatively new, and was first used by Sol Smith Russel. It is rather a pretty story, but some of the situations are hackneyed, and at times 'tis passing unnatural. Neill himself made a less favorable impression than some others of his company, but it is hardly fair to judge him from one part, and that one written to suit the style of another actor.

Julia Dean, the soubrette of the combination, had the "fat" female role. She was sweet and winning in the comedy passages, but a bit unnatural when she drew on the pathetic. Edythe Chapman was best of the women. She has that rare naturalness which is the height of art in acting; her work in a stronger and more extended part will be awaited with interest. Emmett Shakleford as the worn-out literary hack, has center stage in a pathetic little scene which he makes the best bit of real acting in the performance. Benjamin Howard is another actor with the art of nature; he is handicapped by an unfortunate physique. Lillian Andrews, in the inevitable old woman part, is the best actress of this genre we have had in this year's stock companies.

But the feature which deserves commendation, when all is said and done, is the taste shown in every detail—acting, costuming and setting. This has become a rare virtue in this territory, and if the Neills keep it up, they will reap their reward.

The farce presented at the Grand this week by the students of the University of California is surprisingly good in more respects than one. It is true that the situations are mostly old, but they are handled cleverly and the dialogue and incident are both witty and natural. "James Wobberts, I. S. S." is not a work which would be acceptable on the professional stage. If we take it kindly and laugh at, it it is because of the indulgence which the world grants to students and lovers. But it gives promise for the future. It can hardly be expected that a young man yet in college can turn out professional work, but there is great promise for the future in Mr. Tully's clever play.

Such a piece, acted as well as it is, could hardly have come from any college, except one where the drama has been encouraged. We have just wakened to the fact that the student shows of the University of California are among the best given in this country. The other Pacific Coast University comes in for its share of praise. I remember a performance of "She Stoops to Conquer," given at Stanford three years ago, which was worthy of all praise, and the burlesque melodrama written and staged this year by Chris Bradley and W. M. Erb touched the heights of college extravaganza. But at Stanford there has never been any particular encouragement from the faculty, while at California Professor L. Du Pont Syle has made the staging of student plays part of his business. As a dramatic critic for a daily paper, Mr. Syle is a "frost," but his efforts with the college drama have been directly responsible for the scholarly productions given at Berkeley the past few years.

The acting in the present production is intelligent rather than able. One exception should be noted: Mr. Ben Southard proves in this farce, as he has proved in the other Berkeley "shows" of the past two years, that he has the "real thing" in him only waiting little chance and much hard work for development.

Theatrical Notes.

The Neill Company will continue "A Bachelor's Romance" at the California through next week.

One of the greatest musical events of a season which has been rich musically and poor theatrically is to be the appearance of Petschnikoff and Hambourg, Russians both, the one a violinist of great vogue in Europe, the other a young pianist second only to Paderewski. The two artists have been touring the East separately and have only recently joined forces for the Western trip. Without exaggeration it may said that this is a great event in the musical world, as both these men are believed by critics to be coming masters. Aime Lachaume, the French pianist and composer, will assist. The concerts are billed for the California at 2.30 on the afternoons of April 16, 18 and 20. The price of reserved seats ranges from 75c. to $2.00.

"Quo Vadis" keeps up its heavy houses at the Alcazar, and is in for an indefinite run. As is usual with plays of this religious type, a class of people who take the worthy purpose of the show as an excuse for attendance make up the bulk of the audiences. April 19, there will be a "pastorial night," when the courtesies of the house will be extended to the clergy of the city.

RHODOTTA FERNER,
An aspirant for honors Vaudeville.

The Orpheum management has arranged a particularly strong bill for Easter week. By special arrangement, the head-liners of the Hopkins Trans-Oceanic Specialty Company will combine with the Orpheum's own stars to make up the program. The new people include Mlle. Marzella with a troupe of performing dogs; the Guitanos, comedy acrobats and pantomimists from Paris; Falke and Semon, musical comedians; A. O. Duncan, ventriloquist; Bellman and Moore, singing and dancing comedians.

The presentation of "Quo Vadis" at the Alcazar this week has proved rather more of a success than might have been expected. Miss Jeannette Gilder's dramatic version of the story was followed closely by the audience. Apparently nearly everyone there had read the book. The production itself was highly picturesque, both in scenery and in costume. The play, of course, is a pronounced melodrama, and melodrama is a great temptation for any kind of an actor to rant and shout a little in it. But if the company can but keep the house interested, nothing else matters much.

Henry Miller has engaged Frank Worthing for his company, which will play here in June.

A sale of home-made candy, cakes and Easter eggs will be held in the Sunday School rooms of St. Luke's Church on Saturday, April 14th, from 2 to 6. The sale is for the benefit of the Building Fund of the new church, and is under the auspices of the following young ladies: Miss Bernie Drown, Miss Bertha Smith, Miss Cadwalader, Miss Anne Field, Miss Charlotte Field, Miss Florence Stone, Misses Cole, Miss Simpson, Miss Helen Gibbs, Miss Therese Morgan and Miss Florence Davis.

An attempt to discredit the Pacific Mutual Debenture Co. has only served to draw attention to the merits of an excellent institution. The concern is the development of a first-rate idea, and is officered by men of A 1 financial standing. Its February statement shows a reserve fund of $11,348, an increase of $1,293 over the previous month. It has retired up to date $22,700 of its liability, and is growing at a great rate. The writer has read a long series of testimonials from investors in the company, all expressing satisfaction with its success and confidence in its integrity. The concensus of opinion among those who have had dealings with the corporation is that it furnishes an ideal form of investment for people who desire to lay aside a small amount every month.

CHURCH CHOIR.

programme. Possibly the most direct cause why so many well equipped singers remain ignobly silent while new and unknown names are thrust forward with confusing frequency, lies in the fact that most of the choirs are controlled more or less directly by teachers who refuse even a hearing to any one not on their list of pupils. The concert manager need not look far for "talent." In most cases he has to run from the insistent music teacher with the ubiquitous prodigy to exploit; often through an entirely selfish intention of commending "pull," he allows himself to be approached by whomsoever brings the highest bid in the way of future usefulness to him. Dozens of aspirants, though still in the embryonic stage, present their wares with a degree of confidence that might be envied by a seasoned professional. Now-a-days every girl who has a voice or hasn't taken lessons, and after a very few lessons, is ready to try her voice, not on the dog, but on the dear public. Given the chance she faces her audience with a degree of complacency that is pitiful. At the first faint hand-clap she is back again with the previously prepared encore, abuse of which is causing the concert hall to be avoided by those who cannot sleep comfortably in opera chairs. Unfailingly the policy of leaving an audience in the attitude of desiring more is disregarded, not only by the new recruits, but by most bidders for notoriety, who catch at any suggestion that the public cannot have too much of them. Truly, he who will have abolished the encore nuisance, will deserve to be done in bronze with the rest of the nation's most courageous.

Usually when ambition is linked with painful poverty of material, the vocal student is advised that her gift is not "phenomenal" enough to admit of her entering the field with Gadski, but will be very useful in church choir work.

Pity 'tis that some of the zeal spent in acquiring painful accomplishments were not focused toward the useful science of cookery, for they do say that much of the prevailing lack of matrimony is due to the pose of young women as "vocalists," vaudevillists, parlor skirt dancers, and, saddest of all elocutionists. The knowing young man is shy of the fad-ridden woman. MARY RATH WINN.

HOW HE KNEW.—President Eliot, of Harvard, went into a crowded restaurant in New York for lunch. The intelligent negro who stood at the door took his hat but gave no check for its return. An hour later, when he came out of the dining room, the negro glanced at him in a comprehensive way, turned to the shelves and handed him his hat. President Eliot is a man who prides himself on his powers of observation, and the negro's ability to remember to whom each article of clothing belonged struck him as being something very wonderful. "How did you know this was my hat?" he asked. "I didn't know it, sah," was the reply. "Then why did you give it to me?" the president persisted. "Because you gave it to me, sah."

DIDN'T CARE A CUSS.—During a terrific storm on Lake Michigan the Amanda Jane, a trading schooner, began to leak badly. The pump broke and conditions seemed as bad as possible when the crew noticed the absence of their skipper. The mate and one of the sailors climbed painfully to the hatch and descended into the cabin. The swinging lamp was lit, and there, comfortably housed in a stationary armchair, sat the Dutch skipper, reading a book and calmly smoking his long pipe. "Great heavens, cap," yelled the mate, "don't you know the ship's sinking?" The skipper took the pipe out of his mouth and said, calmly: "My friendts, I don't care von cuss. I hev got a cancer on my livers, und I die in six veeks anyvay."

A POOR FALKLAND.—During a performance of "The Rivals," in which Joe Jefferson played "Bob Acres," the actor rendering "Falkland" was inadequate to the role. In the scene in which "Falkland," "Captain Absolute," and "Bob Acres" have a wordy altercation, "Falkland" ranted violently, raised his voice to an unnecessary pitch, and finally, in a burst of anger, slammed a door as he made his exit. It is part of the business for "Captain Absolute" to say at this juncture, "Poor Falkland!" He did so, and Mr. Jefferson promptly replied, "The poorest I ever saw!"

x

THE WAY OUT.—When the Chicago Record was placing its foreign correspondents, George Ade was sent abroad by Victor Lawson for that purpose. Ade did all right until he reached Servia. There he found all the newspaper men in jail for political offenses. In a quandary he telephoned to Mr. Lawson: "Newspaper men all in jail. Press Censor very strict." Lawson cabled back: "Make Press Censor correspondent." And Ade did.

x

A CRUSHING RETORT.—Foote, the great actor, was the guest of a wealthy banker at his country house. At dinner a dispute arose between the actor and a young nobleman who sought to disparage Foote by asking what his father was. "A tradesman," said Foote. "Then, sir, it's a pity he did not make you one." "And pray, what was your father, my lord?" "My father, Mr. Foote, was a gentleman." "Then, my lord, it's a pity he did not make you one!"

x

RUSKIN'S LIMITATIONS.—George Trevelyan, a well-known English writer, was walking with a young woman to whom he desired to show all the celebrities of Cambridge. They encountered Ruskin, and Trevelyan, hoping he would say something characteristic, addressed the great man, asking if he had heard the news. "What news?" was the reply. "Plevna has fallen." "Plevna? I never heard of it. I know nothing later than the fourteenth century."

x

ENGLISH AS SHE IS CONJUGATED.—A United States Consul in one of the French seaports was asked to preside at an examination in English at the chief municipal school. "Jean, you will stand up," said the master to his brightest pupil. Conjugate the verb 'I have a gold mine.'" "I have a gold mine," responded the bright pupil, with scarcely an accent, "Thou hast a gold thine, He has a gold hisen, We have a gold ourn, They have a gold theirn."

A PRIZE THOUGHT.—A teacher of music in one of the public schools of the South desired to impress the pupils with the meaning of the signs "f" and "ff" in a song they were about to sing. After explaining that "f" meant forte, he said: "Now, children, if "f" means forte, what does "ff" mean?" Silence reigned for a moment, and then he was astonished to hear a bright little fellow shout: "Eighty!"

A BRIEF SERVICE.—A distinguished English clergyman was on a voyage to Egypt in a Cunard steamer, and on Sunday, in the Bay of Biscay, undertook to hold service. He read one of the sentences, and said: "Dearly beloved brethren, the Scripture moveth us in sundry places," when he had to bolt and collapse.

PALACE and GRAND HOTELS

For nearly a quarter of a century these Hotels have been the recognized headquarters for Tourists and Travelers visiting San Francisco.

Their popularity has been acquired by reason of their unique location (being accessible to wholesale and shipping districts and amusement centers), the peculiar excellence of cuisine and service, and moderate charges.

The Grill Rooms for ladies and gentlemen have an international reputation, and the recently added Supper Room is now recognized as the place to obtain after-theatre refreshments.

EVENTS CURRENT.

The War in South Africa. With the opening of the week, came a report of a heavy British reverse in South Africa. It was alleged that the Burghers had inflicted a crushing defeat, killing and wounding 600 and capturing 900. The rumor was given credence at the time, but has not been confirmed by any official report and is now regarded as a canard. The Boers, however, continued their investment of the Free State, and the object of the mysterious movement soon became apparent. They were obtaining provisions for the winter campaign. Commandos met on the way out of Transvaal had empty wagons, while those returning were burdened with the harvests of the Free State. In their first movement down the country, the Boers isolated and besieged a considerable British force at Wepener. General Brabant had several skirmishes in attempting the relief, and the garrison made a sharp sally in which they inflicted considerable loss on the Boers. Together, the two forces succeeded in raising the siege early in the week, and the Boer force is now retreating along the Basutoland border. The Basutos, who are becoming more restive every day, are following along in a parallel direction, waiting to attack the Boers should they cross their borders. Meanwhile, Roberts' men may attempt to trap this force, which is heavily laden with provisions. Several small indications go to show that Roberts has remounted his army to his satisfaction and that his long expected advance into Transvaal is close at hand. On the other border, the Boers have been making a demonstration in front of Ladysmith, but are not yet in touch with the British. The official list of British casualities for the war foots up about 18,000 in killed, wounded and captured. Newspaper correspondents at the front place the Boer loss at about 12,000.

Opening of the Paris Exposition. All Paris made holiday on Sunday, April 15, when the great Exposition of 1900 was formally opened. The ceremonial part of the proceedings was simple. Mr. Millerand, director-general of the Exposition, met President Loubet in the grand Salle des Fetes and made a formal oration, handing over the great fair to the president on behalf of the nation. M. Loubet responded, and the formal part of the occasion was completed by a presidential visit to the various buildings. This simple ceremony was made impressive by the gorgeous uniforms of the Republican Guards and the costumes of the foreign dignitaries in the presidential party. There was a tremendous crush; the enclosure swarmed with spectators, and, owing to inadequate transportation, thousands of visitors could not get to the grounds. The Exposition is absolutely incomplete. The American exhibit is the only one prepared and installed, a fact remarked and commended by President Loubet. Many of the buildings are unfinished and the whole exposition will not be in shape for a month at least.

A Cable Line for Hawaii. The Senate has adopted a compromise measure in regard to the Pacific cable question. Congress has been halting between two courses—direct government ownership and the subsidizing of the Pacific Cable Company. The bill just passed by the Senate provides for government construction and ownership of a cable line to Hawaii only. The sum of $300,000 is appropriated to do the work, which is to be under the supervision of the Secretary of the Navy, and materials are to be purchased of American firms, providing that their prices are not more than 12 per cent higher than those of foreign houses. This clause met with fierce opposition from those senators who do not favor government encouragement of industries, but was finally passed. The Secretary of the Navy may use any ship in the possession of his department for cable-laying, and if he finds that his force of vessels and workmen is inadequate he may let contracts for any or all portions of the work, as he sees fit. The line is to start from San Francisco. It is confidently asserted that the bill will pass the House. While this is a point gained for government ownership, it does not entirely dash the hopes of the Pacific Cable Company. This line is an experiment in government ownership; if it succeeds, some future Congress is likely to go on with the project, extending the line from Honolulu to the Orient. In any case, the proposed Pacific cable may pass Honolulu by altogether, being stretched straight from San Francisco or Seattle to the Orient. Action on the completed cable is, by this measure, put off for some future Congress.

Conspiracy in Brazil. The eight-year-old Brazilian republic is already troubled by monarchist plots, although they have not been of sufficient magnitude to seriously endanger the republic. The first appearance of disaffection came about a year ago, but amounted only to mutterings. Then, more recently, the reactionary plotters stirred up a strike of street-car drivers in Rio de Janeiro, hoping that the ensuing industrial disturbances would give them an opportunity to raise a revolution. This failed, and was followed by an insignificant uprising in the police brigade. This being quelled, a more extensive plot was formed; the army was to be encouraged to rise in revolt and depose the president and members of the Republican government on February 22–24. The plot was discovered and frustrated through the vigilance of the army and the loyal police. Nevertheless, there were disturbances of some importance before the police were sure of control. Several officers in the army and navy, a few policemen, and a great number of private citizens, were arrested during the period of strain. The civilians were released in order to conciliate the people, but the soldiers and sailors are to be court-martialed. The government claims that the attempted revolution was much greater in extent than appeared on the surface and that the plotters were not only monarchists but people of every shade of opinion. This, they state, caused the downfall of the plot; the conspirators could agree neither on measures nor plans of action.

American Trade in China. An intelligent and practical view on the absorbing question of our trade relations with China is an innovation. This is a field where the harvest is ripe and the laborers few; the workers have too much to do to spare the time for magazine articles. This fact gives the greater weight to a paper in the April McClure's by William Barclay Parsons, chief engineer of the largest American company operating in China and the American who has penetrated farthest into the closed part of the empire. The original feature of his paper is his assumption that the so-called conservatism of China is political and social rather than commercial. The Chinese abhor our ways and are opposed, though more mildly, to our mixing in Chinese politics, but there is no specially deep-rooted aversion to our goods. They object only to the more radical and complex of European machines, such as railroads, and to those because they do not understand them. Mr. Parsons was the first white man to penetrate the closed province of Hu-nan. Yet everywhere in that district he found European goods in the shops, showing that where the Chinese will not admit the foreigner they give free passage to his productions. The writer calls attention to the fact that statistics regarding the amount of American trade as compared with that of the European nations are strangely misleading. In official figures, all goods passing through Hong Kong are listed as British imports to China. In reality, the Hong Kong imports include a great mass of goods from all the other commercial nations, the United States in especial. From carefully prepared figures taking into account this fact, Mr. Parsons proves that the United States stands fourth in the bulk of China trade, Great Britain, Japan and India leading in the order named. But the India trade has decreased in volume in the past twenty years; we have been increasing most rapidly of all, and will soon pass Japan. Our China trade is greater now than that of all the continental nations of Europe. Should political conditions remain stable, we would overhaul all the others except Great Britain within a year or two, and would very likely take the lead within the next decade. But the change in the government of China is close at hand, and we must look at once for a "sphere of influence" if we hope to hold our advantage. This is not a theory. Russian trade in Manchuria has grown from nothing to respectable proportions since the Czar acquired control over that province. At the present time, the Chinese in general regard the United States more favorably than any of the other powers, but this will not hold the trade for us unless we exert some political influence. Finally, Mr. Parsons urges, as all observers of the China trade have continually urged, the necessity of studying Chinese conditions and wants. Our manufacturers—and our chief expansion is to come in the way of manufactured goods—have been literally stupid in sending goods which are excellent from the Occidental point of view but inferior according to Chinese standards. Cotton prints form our chief article of export, yet our mill men could spread our cotton trade immeasurably if they would only manufacture prints on patterns regarded as beautiful by the Chinese.

Settlement of the Porto Rico Squabble. The long and bitter struggle over the Porto Rico tariff question ended last week by the passage in the House of the Senate's general bill for the government of the island. There was a hard fight on the final day, and the measure only squeezed through by a bare majority of eight votes. The Porto Rico tariff question had already gone through the House. This first bill was a very simple affair, making the legal tariff 15 per cent of the Dingley schedule. It was taken up by the Senate and grafted as an amendment upon the general bill for the government of Porto Rico. Then the storm broke. The wild anti-administration organs took up the matter, and, indeed, many out-and-out Republican papers were for granting free trade to the new colony. It seemed for a time as though the Senate would throw out the tariff clause; the matter became of such importance that the Republican leaders of both sides held several conferences. The friends of the amendment won their point in these secret sessions, the Senate finally passed the whole bill with a slight modification of the objectionable clause, and it was sent to the House and ratified as stated above. The signature of the President has already made it a law. The Senate modifications eliminate all restrictions on goods coming into the United States from Porto Rico and exclude certain food stuffs and goods which came into the country free under Spanish rule from the operation of the 15 per cent clause.

An Anti-Trust Decision. The United States Supreme Court has recently handed down a decision which partially affirms the constitutionality of a state law against trusts, and will prove a precedent in testing other laws regulating industrial combinations. The trust in question was the Waters-Pierce Oil Company, a branch of the Standard Oil Company, organized in Missouri in 1889 and operating in Texas. There is a state law against trusts in the latter state, secured by statutes passed in 1889 and 1895. Under these, suit was entered by the commonwealth to revoke the company's permit to do business within the state. The state won in District Court and Court of Appeals in Texas; carried to the Supreme Court, judgment was affirmed. The transactions by which it was claimed that the statute was violated were contracts with certain merchants in which it was agreed that the merchants should buy from the company exclusively and sell at a fixed rate. In handing down the decision, the Supreme Court expressly stated that all points except one had been ignored. That one was the question concerning state's rights to limit the power of contracting of a company formed without its borders, virtually a foreign corporation. On this point, the opinion held that "the state prescribes the purposes of a corporation and the means of executing those purposes." In opposition, the company's attorneys held that the decision of the lower courts was a violation of the Fourteenth Amendment to the national Constitution, and was of such sort that it made discrimination between persons and classes of persons. Since the court did not hold the Fourteenth Amendment to be applicable to the case at bar, it follows that the decision virtually establishes the constitutionality of anti-trust laws

The Political Situation. In a paper in the current issue of the Atlantic Monthly, Henry Loomis Nelson advances the somewhat novel opinion that the Democratic party has more than a fighting chance of winning the coming national election. This theory was advanced before Dewey announced his candidacy; it would be a matter of interest to hear what Mr. Nelson thinks of the bearing of this event upon the complication. It would be easy to make a forecast, if there were only one main issue, but the existence of three vital questions, two of them new, renders the situation infinitely complex. Were silver the only question, the Republicans would win beyond a doubt; with Imperialism as the sole issue, the Democrats would probably win. Concerning the trust question, one can speak with less confidence. It is hard to define the exact nature of a trust and its exact bearing upon the public welfare. This is a hazy issue, easily dodged, and, although it will make much noise in 1900, its influence will be small, smaller even than that of the protection-free-trade question, which will hardly be mentioned at all, but which will have its quiet bearing on the result just the same. Free silver is a vain hope just now, the feeling of the country being even stronger for gold than in 1896, though Bryan is doing his best to keep the cause alive in the West. Imperialism is the real issue. The opposition to the imperialistic idea is strongest in the East, the determining factor in national politics. Owing to the complete change in political questions brought on by the Spanish war, the body of unpledged and independent voters is larger than ever before. Of this body, certain classes are foreordained as Republican supporters. There is the large body of young men whose imagination has been stirred by the dream of national expansion. This class will grow smaller as election approaches and the memory of the war grows fainter, but it will still have its influence. There are those who contend that "the flag cannot be hauled down" in our new dependencies. Others believe that we owe a duty to the Filipinos and cannot leave them without dishonor. Added to these, there are two forces working in the darkness and quiet, but of great power. One is the missionary idea. Thousands of good Protestants are for holding the islands that we may evangelize them. The other is the influence of what Bryan calls the "monied aristocracy." Commercial men in general see a great trade outlet in expansion, but they are saying very little about it because of the noise made by their Democratic opponents on this very issue. This clerical and commercial support is not to be underestimated. The contention that imperialism is un-American will be the main hold of the Democratic party in opposing these various elements, yet it is strong enough to affect the complex strength of the Republicans. If the Republicans are wise, they will make their fight on the money question and dodge imperialism and expansion so far as possible, Mr. Nelson thinks. The more strenuously the Democrats insist on silver, the more are they betrayed into the hands of their opponents. Regarding nominees, Mr. Nelson believes with the country that Bryan and McKinley are to face one another again. There are now two wings in the Democratic party. The one, headed by Bryan and Jones, is strong in numbers and weak in brains; the other, with Croker, McLean and Gorman at its head, is in a reverse position, having no great amount of following but possessing a body of able and astute leaders. This last faction normally favors gold and hates Bryan, but will support him if he is nominated. On the other side, McKinley is the "whole show." Mr. Nelson regards him as a phenomenally astute politician, who has the faculty of feeling the public pulse and of forcing his ends while presenting the appearance of being forced to them by circumstances. In conclusion, he summarizes as follows:—"The Republican party is likely to carry the country on the money question. If it could maintain the explicitness of its position on imperialism, it might win on that issue, but this seems impossible. If, on the other hand, the Democratic party could nominate a candidate having no responsibility for the platform of 1896, and should compel a contest on definite issues arising from our occupation of the Philippines, the chances would be in its favor, for it would by this means gain a better position in the East than the one which it lost by the campaign of 1896. It would lose only in the far West and would have all the strength which Mr. Bryan could build up in the Middle West."

Importation vs. Manufacture.

IN the San Francisco news announcements a few days ago was an item stating that "a steamship with a carrying capacity of fifteen thousand tons was under construction at the Union Iron Works." It was further stated that "the vessel is to be put in commission next July," and that "she is intended for the sugar trade between Honolulu and New York, and will return with merchandise to San Francisco from the latter port. There will be three other vessels of the same capacity in the fleet." This announcement is at once, very naturally, seized upon by the San Francisco press as an innovation that will result in immense advantage to San Francisco, and is gravely regarded as a sign and forerunner of the immense commerce that is to come to San Francisco through the acquisition of the Philippines, the Hawaiian Islands, etc, etc. As to the truth of this paragraph we know nothing. As to the route and the purpose, the character of freights, points and destination, we only have the newspaper for authority, but the fact remains that the plum is regarded as one most beneficial to San Francisco.

Is it? Let us examine it. It will divert a certain amount of the Hawaiian sugar trade from San Francisco to New York. That certainly is apparent on its face. Then the vessels are to "return loaded with merchandise to San Francisco." In other words they will return loaded with Eastern manufactures. How much of manufactured goods are now exported from the port of San Francisco to Hawaii, the Treasury department statistics will show they will and must rapidly decrease after this line of steamers have been established. The New York manufacturer and jobber will then enjoy direct and regular communication with Hawaii, and it is not possible that these goods of "Eastern manufacture" will be shipped to the California jobber by the new steamship line, unloaded here, and then be reloaded and reshipped to the Hawaiian consumer. Not much. Honolulu will possess every advantage over this port, and if the Islands do not now support local jobbers, they will spring up like mushrooms. Merchandise destined for island ports will doubtless be loaded on top of cargo, so as to be easily discharged. On her journey out from New York the new "vessel of fifteen thousand tons" burthen will put in at Honolulu to discharge the "Eastern merchandise" that once was shipped from San Francisco. There the new vessel will take on sugar to replace the merchandise discharged, and proceed to San Francisco. On her return trip the new line will take on our usual freights to Honolulu less our usual "Eastern merchandise," and leave the port of San Francisco without having conferred a dollar's benefit on her western terminal. It may be urged that the new line will reduce freights so as to bring in Eastern manufactured goods cheaper than the prevailing railroad rates. We have had an experience of that kind before now. It was during the days of the traffic association. When freights were low the jobber flooded the country with goods manufactured in the East, pocketed the savings in freight, and closed down the factories that were struggling for existence in California.

What is needed in San Francisco, is trade with countries that have raw material to market in exchange for manufactures. San Francisco does not need and does not want cheaper freights from the great manufacturing centers. It wants to, and it must, encourage the upbuilding of local manufactures. The fruit industries of the State prosper with low rates of freight east-bound, but low west-bound freights sound the death knell to Californian institutions. What San Francisco needs, are lines of steamers that will bring to this port raw material to be here manufactured and in turn exported.

Down at Galveston recently Mr. C. P. Huntington addressed the merchants as to the future of that city. The Board of Trade and Chamber of Commerce should invite this thoroughly informed gentleman to dinner with them, and prevail upon him to give them his views as to what would best subserve the interests of the commerce of San Francisco. Mr. Huntington must have distinct and clear views upon this subject and his ripened judgment would be of material value, and assistance.

The Alleged Japanese Invasion.

APROPOS of home manufacturing, early in the week, the Examiner contained two strangely inopportune editorials entitled: "The Japanese Invasion," another, "Railroad Rates and Sea Carriage." The first article was one of a series of spiteful arguments against Japanese immigration. Among other things it contains the following declaration:

"We regard the Japanese as, on the whole, a more dangerous competitive factor than the Chinese. They work for smaller wages than the Chinese. Their scale of living is lower. People used to think that nobody could live more cheaply than a Chinese coolie, but that was before we had experience with the Japanese."

In the article on "Railroad Rates and Sea Carriage" the same journal, in the same column, says:

"San Francisco is the great sea-port of the western coast of the continent. The natural course of trade is that goods (and of course this means manufactured articles) from Europe and the East should come hither by sea; and from the ware-houses of San Francisco be distributed over the Coast."

According to this very astute economist, we should deny cheap labor the right to live among us, we should blot out every vestige of hope of future manufacturing, and convert San Francisco into an uninviting city of dismal warehouses for the purpose of storing and distributing goods manufactured by the cheaper labor of Europe and the East. What kind of damnable tom foolery is this to be seriously advanced by a journal that pretends to seriously advise the public. The bane and curse of San Francisco is its lack of manufacturing plants. One of the causes of failure in this direction is the absence of cheap labor. Another is high taxation, which may be cured by legislation; another is high rates of interest and an unwillingness on the part of local banks to carry local factories. The chief trouble, however, is an absence of cheap labor. San Francisco should be something more than a mere warehouse and distributing point for the handiwork of the cheap labor of Europe and the East. An entire business block of jobbers dealing in Eastern and European manufactures might be wiped out of existence in San Francisco every day in the week, with profit to the entire State, if the block of jobbers could be replaced by one factory employing five hundred hands. Suppose the Japanese and Chinese should enter largely into the list of operatives and employes, better have it so than have no factories at all. Better have it so than support the cheap labor of other lands from which the State reaps no earthly benefit. There seems to be no difficulty about cheap labor in the East. No yellow journal protests, no shrieking opposition. Mr. Hearst's New York journal does not advise New Yorkers to convert their city into a warehouse for foreign manufactures. It has no fault to find with the Huns, the Slavs, the Poles and the Italians who overrun the Eastern labor markets. Mr. Hearst must know that thousands of Italian laborers who never intend to become citizens come over in droves under the padrone system to work in America from six to eight months and return to Italy to spend their savings. He must know that it is a common thing during busy seasons for all sorts of mechanics from Europe to invade the large cities of the East, not with an intent to stay, but with their return tickets in their pockets, to be used whenever work grows slack. The Japanese are not a whit worse than these immigrants; as students they are as orderly, and toward the support of local merchants they contribute as much. But more than all of this, they are incapable of ever becoming citizens; they do not impress their degraded characters upon our politics; they do not become citizens in name only to betray the trust and barter their votes to the highest bidder on election day. Not being voters, cowardly politicians are not led to legislate for them. If we are to have ignorant and cheap labor, then give us the kind that under our laws cannot become citizens, in preference to the kind that contaminates Eastern politics. Let Mr. Hearst take a day off and pass through Baxter street and the foreign quarter of New York. He may walk for blocks without being able to find a sign printed in the English language. He will come in contact with as much dirt, as much filth and degradation, as can be found in San Francisco's Chinatown. In this quarter he will hear the newsboys calling out in strange tongues, not the daily papers published in the English language, but those of a foreign tongue. He will find squalor and filth on every side, sweat shops and factories steaming with the odor of human filth. Let him go down to the factories where are made the goods he would have us buy and store in our warehouses, and he will find the cheap labor that has made manufacturing possible there.

The introduction of cheap labor and the establishing of local factories will not reduce operators' wages here, for we have no factories. It cannot affect wages in the East or Europe, for already they have cheap labor.

It has been urged that the western coast offers no opening for manufactures. That population is dense in the East and sparse in the West; that our only customers are the adjacent western states; that we are located at the "jumping off place," and have no territory to supply to the west Our contiguity to the ocean should be a tower of strength, not an element of weakness. It is merely a question of developing seaward customers, merely a question of venturing out beyond the Heads and turning the prow of our ships, north, south or west. Territory! We have millions of consumers who may be reached by steam or sail and from whom we may take raw material for manufacture. San Francisco needs to eliminate the idea that it must depend upon the cheap labor of Europe and the East for its manufactures: it must eliminate the idea that it must be and remain a warehouse for the goods from other lands. It must cultivate and encourage the idea of laying a broad and deep foundation based on home manufactures, with warehouses stored with home manufactures, with jobbers dealing in home manufactures, and with ships outward bound laden with home manufactures, not inward bound with manufactures of other lands and other peoples. Let us devote as much time and energy toward establishing lines of sail or steam vessels as we have toward reducing railroad rates, let us devote as much time and energy toward establishing home factories as we have toward getting the manufactures of other lands, and ensuing results will operate to the permanent and lasting good of the State. So long as we depend upon the East, our supremacy as a distributing point can only be maintained by artificial means. This was developed by the testimony taken recently by the Interstate Railway Commission. The Wave pointed out the fact weeks ago. Years ago we declared that our hope of the future lay in our ability to manufacture cheaply enough to sell our goods at a price below the Eastern cost of manufacture plus freight. When this can be done, when we have cultivated our seaward neighbors and entered into friendly commercial relations with them, San Francisco will drive the Eastern manufacturer out of the West, resume her position of former days, and grow in population tenfold, but not until then.

Alien Mining Claim Titles.

SENATE HANSBROUGH of North Dakota has proposed an amendment to the Alaska Civil Government bill that will, if adopted, prevent all who are either aliens or have not declared their intention to become citizens of the United States from making locations on mining land in that territory. This amendment in effect extends to Alaska the present law on the subject now in force everywhere else within the boundaries of the United States. It seems that some of the richest claims in Nome have been located by Laplanders who were not citizens and had not declared their intention to become such. The claims have since been located by American citizens, who have complied with all the requirements of the law and who, if unmolested, will eventually secure patents and pay the government price therefor. In many instances the citizen locator has been ejected by the aliens, and has been prevented from even performing the annual or the $500 worth of assessment work necessary to entitle him to receive a patent from the government. In the meantime the alien claimants, or their grantees, who, of course, occupy no better or stronger position than the original alien claimants, will be permitted to work the ground and extract all of the gold contained therein. This works a great hardship to the citizen who is clearly entitled to possession, and damages him by destroying his property. If not restrained the alien will render the property absolutely worthless. The alien can never obtain title from the government. Hence the United States is damaged and is an interested party. Until an application for a patent is filed no claimant can raise the question of non-citizenship. This will never arise between the claimants as we show. The government should step in and protect its own citizens and not permit these aliens or those who have succeeded to their illegal claims to retain possession and, by extracting the gold products, irreparably damage the lawful owner and also deprive itself of the market value of the land. We trust that every member of Congress from the Pacific Coast will vote in favor of the Hansbrough amendment. It is simple justice, and is such legislation as the government owes to its own citizens.

COMMUNICATION.

KRUGER'S POWER OF RESISTENCE.

REALIZING the power of the picturesque personality of Paul Kruger in influencing pro-Boer sentiment in the United States, I feel called upon, as a British sympathizer and an old resident of South Africa, to tell what I know of his character and habits.

Kruger is anxiously seeking the interference of neutral powers to put a stop to the disastrous war by which so much blood and treasure has been lost, so many hearts broken, and which seems now as far as ever from final settlement. But in every conflict, whether between individuals or nations, there is only one moment in which both parties may be prevailed upon to lay down their arms and cease their strife. That moment passed long ago, and England must pursue her South African policy to the very end.

Any American mining man who has lived in the South African Republic will be ready to certify that the government of the Kruger faction is absolutely rotten. The Transvaal burghers even have twice come close to civil war as a result of Kruger's regime. But in each case the crisis blew over. The old president has in no case been a friend to the mining industry. He has the strangest ideas of political economy, suspects that the Uitlanders are working in concert with his old opponent, Cecil John Rhodes, continually sees imaginary combinations looming in the distance, and the country bought up by Rhodes. Only a little while ago some Englishmen wanted to get a permit from "Oom Paul" to open up a mine in the east of Johannesburg, and the answer that they got was a flat "No, the Uitlanders are getting too rich and no more will be opened!" The dynamite was taxed at an awful rate and everything was done intentionally to hamper the opening and development of the country.

Kruger seemed, after the Jameson raid, to imagine that he was guided by Divine will. His arrogance grew so great that the alternative was revolution or English interference.

Kruger's memory is keen, retentive, and mightily convenient. After an interview the South African capitalist, Mr. J. B. Robinson, had with the president on the stoop of the government house in Pretoria, the Englishman remarked sarcastically: "You can trust Paul Kruger's word, but you must be extraordinarily careful to tie him down exactly to details. In future, I shall take down his promises in shorthand."

A yearning for citizenship would never have entered the head of the Uitlanders as a whole, if they could have obtained the treatment they wanted from the government without the necessity of voting, particularly without voting on the arduous terms on which alone there seemed any chance of the franchise being extended to them.

Let us give the devil his due. It is the Kruger Hollander regime, described as the sick man of South Africa, which by its filthy lucre has caused this unnecessary war.

Yet he deserves every credit for the mistaken heroism with which he has urged his people to defend their country. Only a South African can appreciate the sturdy stand which he is making. The fact that it is in an unjust cause makes it none the less admirable in the abstract. THEO. LOWE.

BUILDING THE NEW WARSHIPS AT THE UNION IRON WORKS, SAN FRANCISCO.

WHERE BATTLE-SHIPS ARE BUILT.

A VISIT TO THE UNION IRON WORKS, SAN FRANCISCO.

IN the slips of the Union Iron Works, six new fighters of Uncle Sam's navy have been quietly building these many months. The great Wisconsin, over whose launching there was so much sensation last year, sits clothed, provisioned and ready for the sea, lacking only her guns and a little fancy work to fit her for service. The battleship Ohio and the monitor Wyoming are not yet prepared for their own element; the monitor is just coming into form and shape, and the battleship is little more than a shell. The triplets, Paul Jones, Preble and Perry, long-nosed torpedo-boat destroyers, are forming under the hands of a myriad of workmen; but they, too, are only shells as yet, lying helpless on dry land caged in by a huge framework of intersecting beams and cranes.

It takes some forty processes to make a pin, the simplest object of modern manufacture. No one knows how many go into the making of a warship, the largest and most complex of machines. The Scotts themselves, the brains of the Union system, cannot hazard a guess. In the thirty acres of great wheels, pistons and beams which make up the Union works, all the parts of a battleship, save a few items of guns, armor and instruments, are turned from pig iron and raw copper into the infinite forms of a great naval fighter.

Everything about the works is immense, titanic. You enter between two flat, undecorated brick buildings, with a front which seems, from its very lack of frills and fancy-work, to be taller than the Mills building. To the left the yard stretches away, a wilderness of great castings, and on the extreme edge of the water, a framework looking for all the world like that of the new postoffice covers the hulls a-building on the docks. To the right lie more of these square, plain buildings; from one of them comes the regular thump of a steam hammer. Your guide—who is more than likely to be a small but polite boy detached from Superintendent John Scott's office for your personal service—first lets you into a tiny door in the highest and most imposing of the buildings. It is the machine shop. It is an orderly confusion of great beams, of giant wheels, of rods like the trunk of a California redwood. It seems impossible that anything so tiny as an ordinary bolt or rivet enters into the composition of these machines. Beside them, the workmen in uniform, black caps and blue overalls lined and spotted with the grease and rust of their machines, seem like the dwarfs of Vulcan's stithy. Man is insignificant contrasted with these, his great works.

Silent Titans.

There is an almost entire absence of the noise which one associates with machines. This is the most surprising thing to a layman. I had imagined that the Union Iron Works would be a babel of striking and hammering and scraping. A block away, one would never know by the sound that the shops are running at all, unless, indeed, the great steam hammer should happen to be going; in that case, you would hear only a faint and muffled thub. In the machine-shop, there is only a subdued whir, no more than the noise made by an electric car. But it would be a small and irreverent person who would attempt to talk in the presence of all this immensity. A crane stretching from floor to ceiling picks up a half-formed casting and heaves it onto a frame. The dwarf beside it pulls a few mysterious levers, and a concealed knife begins to pare away the white steel, which falls in long shavings. Machine and man, the great, stupid giant and the clever dwarf with the controlling brain, work together solemnly, silently; it is the silence of strength. The little machine which dots the pegs into a lady's shoe makes far more racket about it.

Then come more buildings, each large enough to house one of the Scotts' own battleships, and more titanic laborers and huge machines. Here is a steam-hammer with a blow of ten tons. It is hammering into submission a piece of red-hot steel as big as an ordinary keg. A human dwarf stands at the side, lifting and dropping it by means of a lever. It is hard to believe that it is not the man himself who is putting all that power into the blows, so perfectly does it obey his motion. An assistant with a long pair of pliers turns the metal on the anvil. The machine raises and lifts his huge arm, striking with puffs and grunts. There is none of the traditional bursting of sparks; after each blow, a fall of black flakes is shaken from the anvil; that is all. Further on, another machine seizes the deck-plate of a battleship, and bends it as easily as a tinker bends a piece of tin. There is something human about these simple laborers. A modern printing-press, complicated beyond conception, gives no suggestion of the work of hands. But these giants, each doing its great and simple task, seem strangely like human laborers. These tall cranes, bending their backs to lift and lower a ton's burden, seem endowed with life. You expect them to walk away when the whistle blows and the three thousand dwarfs who have hypnotized them into obedience straighten up and hurry out to dinner.

The New Warships.

If you wait your chance and dodge the watchman, you may have an opportunity to get aboard the big hulls being put together on the wharves, the final end and result of all this melting and planing and hammering. The Wisconsin, which will be the mightiest battleship afloat when she goes into commission sometime this summer, is taking on her great guns and her interior fittings. The cabins where the future Deweys and Sampsons are to be housed, smell of glue and varnish. The unpainted joints of the deck show bare and ugly. She is a battleship in chemise and petticoats. The four thirteen-inch guns in her two turrets have been swung into place during the past fortnight, and the smaller destroyers are coming on from the East. Once past the gangway and the watchman, you are supposed to have business on board, and may wander as you will, from the stomach of the ship, where she keeps the coal which feeds her fires of life, to her little eye on the fighting top. The Wisconsin sits in the water, able to go out, if necessary, under her own steam. The torpedo-boat destroyers and the monitor Wyoming, in the next stalls, are helpless under a network of beams. The men at the Union, every one of whom assumes to know as much about the business as "old Irving M." himself, say that the firm expects to get the Wyoming ready in time to have President McKinley launch her next summer. But she is still only a shell. The Ohio is not even that. Her deck-plates are now being placed, and one can look over the edge of the completed area and see her very keel.

A battleship is a heavy-weight prize-fighter, with big, showy muscles sticking out all over; a monitor is a low, bull-necked thug who will rough it when he cannot hit fair; a destroyer is a shifty light-weight with a complement of side-steps and speed unlimited. The big freighter, Californian, which stands beside these professional fighters-resembles them as a huge brewery laborer, whose only function is unlimited work, resembles the smaller, trimmer prize-fighter who could crush him in half a minute. The Californian is being built for the China trade; she will gather commerce in the track cleared out and policed by the five ships building alongside. The others have finer lines and more beauty of form, but they look tiny beside her high, straight hull. She is in process of being sheathed and decked. Over in the shops, an engine is taking in hundreds of pounds of molten metal daily and vomiting it forth as red-hot rivets to be hammered into her sides, while another mighty steel worker is punching out the holes in her plates. The interior is bare and unfurnished. From the unsheathed portion of the decks, one looks downward into a great cavern; for impression of dizzy height and distance it is like a peep into the courtyard from the sixth floor of the Palace Hotel.

On the day of my visit, a ship-builder looking for work was going over the Californian with me. It was he who told me that in the assembling of this great mass of steel, two men had lost their lives.

"Does that happen very often?" I asked.

"The last battleship we built while I was at Glasgow, they killed five men and a boy."

"At once?"

"No; different times. Most of them fell through the decks."

The men behind the guns are not the only ones who give their lives to a naval victory!

WILL IRWIN.

HALF-BREED ROYALTY.

STRANGE FATALITY FOLLOWING UNIONS BETWEEN PRINCES AND COMMONERS.

WHEN Emperor Franz Joseph of Austria received the news that his Empress had been assassinated, he exclaimed, "Could I not have been spared this final blow?" No one who has followed the life of the old ruler of the Austrians can fail to sympathize with the feeling which must have possessed him at that moment, the conviction that all the private sorrows which could be visited upon a ruler had fallen over his life. Misfortunes and disappointments, often made bitterer by the fact that they were his own fault, had followed him from his cradle. Yet the murder of the Empress was only the beginning of a series of evils. Within two years of the dark tragedy of Geneva, he finds his empire sick, very sick indeed, and the greedy Powers, like hypocritical doctors, hurrying it on to its doom. Clear-headed statesman that he is, he must now realize that on his death the mongrel Dual Kingdom will fall and be divided among the Medes and the Persians of Europe. And, to crown his misfortune, there has been an epidemic of mesalliances in the royal family. The widow of the former Crown Prince, the greatest lady in the land since Elizabeth's murder, has given up her titular rank to marry a simple nobleman of Hungary, and his nephew and heir has been secretly married to a woman who has no royal blood in her veins, and can therefore never become Empress of Austria or mother of an Emperor. It all means that the dynasty ends with Franz Joseph's successor.

Marriages between princes and subjects are curious things. Theoretically, the children of such a union ought to be of rather a superior quality. The blood of kings is thin and watered, if not actually degenerate, but royalty represents, after all, hundreds of generations of the best refinement the world has to give. Take all this fineness of organization and fuse it with some fresh, strong stuff from the common people, and the result ought to be an improvement on both sides. The common blood should be clarified, the royal strengthened. But heredity is a curious and perverse thing, and one of its most unaccountable freaks is the manner in which it fails to follow expectations in the blending of classes and races. In Hawaii, the Kanaka-American mixture is "no 'count" as a general thing, while the Kanaka-Chinese mixture, from which little should be expected, makes a strong and efficient race, better than either of the parent stocks. So it is with royal mesalliances. There is hardly an instance in history of a strong or efficient or talented man or woman being produced by a union of sovereign and subject. Including the products of "left-handed marriages," there have been hundreds of these children born within the century. As the marriages which begot them were made for love, the offspring have generally been favorites of their royal parents, have been educated and trained by them and given every chance for advancement. Over their royal cousins they have possessed the advantage of being eligible to the professions, to practical politics or to active army service. Yet all without exception have proved dull and most of them have been depraved and vicious. And in most cases they have compared very unfavorably with their royal relations.

Some Famous Mesalliances.

Perhaps the most obvious and famous example is furnished by the two sons of Victor Emmanuel, the one by his first wife, a princess of Austria, the other by a gamekeeper's daughter. The old King of Italy used to point out the half-peasant son, dubbed Count Mirafiore, as a splendid example of the mingling of steel and iron in the blood, and was disposed to slight his royal son, Humbert. Yet Humbert rules now as the most upright and enlightened monarch of Europe, while Mirafiore's name is a reproach in Italy for the vices and crimes which brought him to an early grave. In Franz Joseph's own kingdom, Count Meran, son of the Archduke of Austria and a peasant girl to whom he was secretly married, grew up dull and worthless, too stolid to be vicious. He occupies a position of courtesy at the Austrian court. If the Austrian Emperor is looking for other examples close at hand to indicate to his nephew the probable outcome of his marriage, he can exhibit his own assistant grand chamberlain, Count Nipperg. The count's grandmother was an archduchess of Austria, his grandfather a chamberlain of noble title but peasant birth. His father, child of this union, died in a madhouse, and he himself has less ability than the average stable-boy. The peasant grandfather was a man of great ability, as his rise from the peasantry to the nobility shows. There is still another instance in point, and here again a royal misalliance has contributed to the unhappiness of the old Emperor. The tragedy of Meyerling, by which the Emperor lost his son and the throne its heir-apparent, was brought about through the machinations of Countess Larisch, daughter of a union between a King of Bavaria and an actress.

Royal Degenerates.

In Prussia, the history of these hybrids shows one who was the author of an anonymous letter scandal, one who died a fugitive and a common criminal, and a dozen who have been notably vicious. In England, the children of these mixed marriages have rarely been vicious, but are always stupid. The ruling house of England, since the time of the Stuarts, has not been especially immoral as kings and princes go, so that the degeneracy of their hybrid offspring has tended only toward dullness. The children of the royal Duke of Cambridge by an actress wife are received in London society under the name of Fairwea her. They are very good, "substantial" people, but they are said to be the most "dunder-headed" members of London's smart set. The men have had every chance to rise in the army and navy, but have utterly failed to win distinction. Then there are the Fitzclarices, descended from George IV and Mrs. Jordan the actress. In the present generation, there has been one suicide and one bankrupt in the family, while the only daughter in the line scandalized society a few years ago by making a runaway match under very discreditable circumstances.

The sons of the union of Princess Mary of Cambridge and an Austrian officer have been the terror of the English royal family through their talent for scandals and scrapes.

There was an epidemic of marriages of this sort in the Spanish royal family a generation ago. As all these marriages were fruitful, Spain is overrun with the debased sons and daughters of her royalties. The kingly blood of Castile is very corrupt as it is, and when mingled with the blood of the common people it makes a disgustingly bad mixture. Queen Isabella, the old sovereign of a thousand scandals, had a large family through her marriage with a guardsman, Munez. One of this family died in Paris of delirium tremens, one died suddenly as a result of dissipation while there was a warrant out for his arrest for fraud, and one played a singularly unpleasant part in the Dreyfus case.

This is, roughly, the record. Is it any wonder that Franz Joseph regards these misfit matches in his family as the crowning sorrow of his life?

AMOS SHELDON.

The prune growers of Washington, Idaho and Oregon are taking steps to combine in a trust. If seventy-five per cent of the growers in the district enter into the agreement by June, the combine will be put into active operation. The scheme was hatched at a convention of fruit growers, being decided upon as the best means of holding up prices. The fruit will theoretically belong to the trust from the time it appears on the trees and will pass into its possession as soon as it is harvested. It is believed that enough prune-growers will sign the agreement to make it an established fact. This is the method which pulled the raisin-growers out of a bad hole several years ago, and is in line with industrial progress.

One of the treasures rescued from the burning Théâtre Francaise is its most valued possession, "Le Registre de Lagrange," a record of the affairs of the theatre from 1659 to 1685, the period of the Moliere company. This is a collection of programs and a register of business transactions, together with a running commentary of important events in the lives of the company's members. It will be added to the museum of the theatre, now being transferred to the Louvre.

The Philippine Commission Banquet.

FROM all accounts the banquet in honor of the Philippine Commission at the Palace Hotel was rather a dreary affair. Some of the orators had too little to say—others said too much. Among the transgressors was Whitelaw Reid, who quite over-stepped the limit as to time and rather oppressed the audience by the authoritative manner in which he directed the commissioners in the paths they must go. I imagined that the form of unofficial instructions was rather resented. Professor Bacon descanted on the discovery of America in a leisurely descriptive vein; President Wheeler was briskly sensible and the several commissioners exhibited a talent for forcible and intelligent expression. Yet the general effect was flat, dreary and protracted. There should be arranged in connection with public banquets a system of alternating seats so that there might be an interchange of partners with each course.

The Examiner's Cuttle-Fish Policy.

THE community of San Francisco has been rather diverted at the cuttle-fish tactics of the Examiner recently. Whenever its intemperate and extravagant bloviation gets it into trouble it proceeds to develop a school boy or school girl competition, with which it fills its pages to the exclusion of matters of importance and to the disgust of those citizens who imagine a newspaper should be something better than a disordered circus poster. That its behavior in the late bubonic plague scare had inspired real indignation finally penetrated to the editorial intelligence and lo, at once, a great prize scheme is let loose. A score of boys and girls are to be triumphantly transported across the continent and a national convention is to be submitted to this inspection. The great educational value of the idea is heralded, eminent educators sign statements that the effect of the plan will be of great enlightment to individual scholars. Pages are devoted to the business and great is the excitement thereof. In the meantime, however, the eminent banker Daniel Meyer had ventured frankly to express his disgust at the bubonic plague scare and to state unreservedly condemnation of the Examiner. Salutary revenge should be taken on all citizens who fail to approve the Monarch's course—hence Daniel Meyer has been on the grill. He has been caricatured and guyed and otherwise maltreated as a warning to those who might be disposed to follow his example. This is upright, honorable and intelligent journalism.

A Friend at Court.

AN interesting episode of life as she is lived in San Francisco was presented at a recent gathering of the Police Commissioners, who had met to try one Officer, Sheehan charged with assaulting a citizen of the Mission. The citizen had had the temerity to ask the policeman to exercise clemency in clubbing an unfortunate and aged German who obstructed justice, whereupon Sheehan turned his weapon on the intervenor. The latter having a political pull promptly complained and some twenty friends and neighbors were there to testify in his behalf. Lo and behold, who should appear in defense of the policeman but young Lawyer Max McNutt, son of Police Commissioner McNutt. The officer was acquitted. There are several ways of looking at the situation herein unfolded. Mayhap the accused had done no more than his duty; mayhap between him and Lawyer McNutt there exists relations outside the cause. It may be urged that the connection between the attorney and the commissioner should not bar the employment of the former. All of which may be conceded in this instance. Hard things will undoubtedly be said, however, if it becomes a popular practice among accused policemen to hire the commissioner's son to plead their cause.

C. P. Huntington's Gifts to the Art Association.

AFTER his business, which is also his chief pleasure, Collis P. Huntington cares most for pictures. His collection of paintings is undoubtedly one of the finest in the United States. In selecting canvases he invites no advice from experts, for he buys on his own judgment absolutely and exercises his individual taste. The value and virtue of his discernment are best appreciated by those who have seen his pictures. He recently presented a superb landscape by Julian Rix to the Art Association and admiring the fine picture of Keith's, "The Summit of the Sierras," which hung in the exhibition in the new gallery, he purchased it and presented it to the Association. One morning last week the pupils of the School of Design were admitted to inspect the art gallery of the Huntington residence, where they saw the noble canvases by Murrillo, the admirable Rousseaus and Diaz and the unequaled series of portraits by the old English masters, that adorn its walls.

Death of F. S. Douty.

WHEN death overtakes an honest, upright man; when a loyal true-hearted soul is suddenly spirited away, the obituary writer vainly searches for words to adequately convey to the world a message that, with complete justice, will portray the dead man's virtues and his sterling worth. Frank Sanger Douty, who died last week, was a man who never in his life's career harbored a selfish or a dishonorable thought. He was honest to a nicety, loyal by every instinct and impulse of his nature. He was endowed with a nobleness of character that enforced respect and commanded admiration. One cannot say much more of a man; yet this brief tribute fails with miserable painfulness to set forth one-half his virtues or convey in any adequate sense the sentiment of one who knew and loved him from boyhood. His was a strong character. His likes and dislikes knew no middle ground. He lacked that species of diplomatic skill which said one thing and meant another. He was deficient only in that he could not deceive. Out-spoken, frank, manly, there was not in all his composition a dishonorable taint or dishonest tendency. His affections once won, remained steadfast; and in the defense of a friend he would risk without counting cost.

Mr. Douty for years has acted as secretary and manager of the Pacific Improvement Company. Millions of money have been entrusted to his care, and millions of property to his management. One need not add that he enjoyed the complete confidence of principals, and administered his duties with zeal and faithfulness. At the time of his death he was secretary and managing officer of the Pacific Improvement Company, president of the Oakland Railroad Company, secretary and treasurer of the Carbon Hill and Rocky Mountain Coal Companies, the Southern Pacific Railroad of New Mexico, and the Capay Land Company He was a director of the Market Street Cable Railroad and a number of other corporations, great and small, in which his principals were interested. He was also a member of the several leading clubs of San Francisco. Wherever he went he was popular. In the best sense of the word he was a gentleman through and through. Stereotyped and hackneyed as the phrase may be, his death is a loss to the community. He was genial, whole-souled and utterly lacking in anything that smacked of affectation. His manner was one of outspoken frankness such as accompanies an honest, fearless nature. No man ever left his presence wondering whether he spoke the truth or whether he was sincere. Noble of character, brave and loyal, honest and unselfish, he was one man in ten thousand. Among the highest tributes paid to his kindness of heart, were the tear-stained faces of the men and boys who served as clerks and assistants in his department. May heaven deal as justly by him as he dealt with his fellow man. More than that he does not need; less than that would not be justice.

Easter Hats, Self-Denial and Feminine Secrecy.

WHO knoweth the name of the wight that originated the fiction about women being unable to keep a secret? I should like to be told the name, in order that I may cover his memory with shame. For a whole congregation of San Francisco women has kept a secret a whole Lententide and kept it well. Beat that, tyrant man, if you are able! It happened thus: St. Luke's, the most fashionable Episcopalian congregation in the city, has just moved into a new church and has incurred the traditional church debt. The ladies of the congregation quietly got together at the beginning of Lent and planned a novel method of raising money. It was agreed that they should dispense with their Easter finery and contribute the same to the collection on that day. A pledge of secrecy was made—and kept. It would have proved a beautiful "Sunday story" for the Easter newspaper supplements, yet not a single society reporter got so much as an inkling of the sensation. It was not divulged until the morning of the day sacred to new gowns and hats, when it was noted that all the ladies of St. Luke's—bud, belle and matron—were wearing their winter headgear, and that the collection footed up over four thousand dollars. About two-thirds of the sum was saved from Easter hats. It was a practical method of self-denial, but the movement was not popular with the milliners.

COLLECTOR OF PORT JACKSON seems to have come within range of sensational journalism, and strangely enough the journal fathering the attack is owned by one of Colonel Jackson's principal bondsmen. The headlines to the attack are scarcely borne out by the text of the articles. They are rich in elusive insinuations, clever in preferring charges that are not charges—which—subjected to analysis, mean nothing, say nothing and prove nothing except that the Call is industriously in search of something sensational that will excite public attention. Colonel Jackson is above the practices, not charged, but insinuated, against him, and no one knowing him believes the Call's alarm to be well founded.

The Intercollegiate Baseball Series.

THE first baseball game of the intercollegiate series was a case of a mediocre but steady team walking away with a brilliant but erratic one. In potential strength, Stanford seemed superior. Lanagan outshone Kaarsberg in the box, and the cardinal men showed that they could hit when hits were needed. But the errors made at critical times were quite too painful to be recounted. Perhaps Havens and Hampton are to be excused, as it was their first college game, but there is no excuse for Murphy and Edwards, who are old hands. The Stanford team deserves no excuse, for they have been unfaithful in their training all the season, and training is as necessary in baseball as in any other form of sport. The attendance at the game at Berkeley day was very poor and an evil omen for the treasuries of the two student bodies when the ruling for campus games shall go into effect. The contest on the Palo Alto campus the following week showed an exact reversal of form. Here, the University of California men played a shade the better game but took a bad base of "rattles," just as their opponents did on the previous Saturday, and piled up enough errors to lose. The deciding game, to be played in San Francisco, is anybody's. It will probably depend upon which team begins making errors, for both seem unsteady, unreliable and incapable of holding together against a run of bad luck. Stanford is the better in the box. Only seven hits were made off Lanagan in the first game as against fourteen off Kaarsburg, and the Stanford pitcher was three hits the better in the second contest. Besides this, he is a "strike-out" pitcher, which is a point of advantage in a contest between two erratic teams. On the other hand, the University of California men play the sharper fielding game, especially in the outfield. The outcome will be largely a matter of luck.

Bryan and Fusion.

WILLIAM JENNINGS BRYAN is a smooth article. Sometimes he is too smooth. This was the case on his recent appearance in Washington. The political conditions in that State are peculiar. The free silver forces are made up of three elements—the Silver Republicans, the Populists and the straight Democrats, fused into one party; these elements do not always work together, but apart not one of them has the power to elect even a constable. Several times the Fusionists have been able to beat the Republicans, but the recent local elections went against them. An outsider would suppose that Bryan's interests lay in equal encouragement of the three divisions of his supporters. But from the very time of his first appearance it became apparent that William Jennings was being coached by the Democrats. He worked imperialism, the trusts and free silver for all they were worth, but when he mentioned any party directly it was always the Democracy. This did not tend to make him popular with the Populists and Silver Republicans, and, now that he has gone his noisy way, there are mutterings of discontent among the two forgotten branches of his party. Wherefore it becomes apparent that a smooth article may be too smooth.

An Effective Retort.

GEORGE H. BROADHURST, the comedy writer, who created the Smith and Jones problem plays, regards Chicago as his American birth-place. Not that he was born there, but his earliest experiences of American life were derived in the office of the Chicago Board of Trade. When "What Happened to Jones" had its first presentation in the metropolis of Illinois Broadhurst thought he would be there in person to accept the congratulations of his friends. There was a big house for the premiere and lots of applause, but how the critics did state the play next morning. H. J. Whigham, who wrote drama for the Tribune, remarked: "One can buy farces like this at Siegel-Cooper's for 15 cents"—this among other disparagements. The patronage of the public somewhat consoled the author for the attacks of his censors and he suffered in silence. On the Saturday evening of the first week Broadhurst, after an inspection of the receipts in the box office, stepped contentedly into the foyer of the theatre. There stood Whigham gossiping with two of his contemporaries. "Have you got thirty cents on you, Whigham?" he said, button holing the critic. "Guess so—what for?" grunted Whigham, apprehensive of a joke. Broadhurst took his arm. "I can show you how to make $3,000," he exclaimed. "Come right along with me to Siegel-Cooper's and get a couple of 15-cent farces like this. There is just $1500 in the house to-night." Mr. Broadhurst is now in San Francisco writing a new comedy. In future he will be "presented by Mr. Chas. Frohman."

SCENES IN OLD MEXICO.

WINTER IN MANILA.

THE UNEVENTFUL LIFE OF OUR NEW CAPITAL.

IN this hot month of February we are as lazy and calm, down here in old Manila, as though our own brothers in arms were not being ambushed, and hacked and bolved within a hundred miles of us. From time to time, a column crawls in from some up-country raid, bringing in their wounded and the lists of their dead; now and then an insurgent leader is caught by the police and furnishes a few hours' excitement. But in the main, the insurrection does not touch us at all. We go on with our round of civil employment, meet at the clubs, enjoy as much society as is possible considering the scarcity of women, and gossip over the happenings of the lazy day. Assuming that Manila is as large as San Francisco, there is wonderfully little "doing." Some pessimist in the early days of American occupation defined Manila as "Hell without excitement." In the first part of this description I do not concur; I stick for a mild sort of purgatory. But excitement is certainly lacking.

Perhaps the most amusing feature of American occupation is the native case in the police courts. These small and simple children of nature put a curious interpretation upon our laws and customs. It is true that some of them are catching on with surprising readiness, we have already had one or two Tagal blackmailers, but in the main our laws are a mystery to them. Why we should object to an innocent little gambling game is more than they can see, and the audacity of a court which incarceuates a man for beating his lawful and wedded spouse is beyond their comprehension. It is not that the Filipino is a habitual wife-beater, not at all, but he desires the right as a natural privilege. And then, their love-affairs get tangled up with our justice. Here is an example. One of General Otis's regulations for the government of the city forbids marriage until the parties are sixteen years of age. Provided the parents are willing, this is an easy law to evade, because it is hard to guess at the age of a little, brown Filipino. Senora Seprina de la Reyes is a Filipino laundress, one of the tribe of destroyers of good linen who infest old Manila. She has a fourteen-year old daughter, Graciana, who was courted by a gay Lothario, aged fifteen, one Rosindo Rodriguez. He was not popular with his mother-in-law in prospect, and was forbidden the house. Forthwith, Senorita de la Reyes developed a most surprising industry in delivering her mother's work, so that some of her patrons received their washing within three weeks of delivery to the Senora—reckless haste for Manila. The Senora did not know it, but Rosindo of the burning heart used to meet his adored around the corner, assist in hurrying up the delivery, and put in the time gained in pressing his suit. Love can do anything. It can even make a Filipino get a move on.

A Native Elopement.

But one night the lovers, sitting in the moonlight on the banks of the Pasig, forgot the lazy passage of time. The Senora, who was growing suspicious of her daughter's unnatural willingness to do errands, instituted a search and came upon the keen Rosindo cooing the Spanish equivalent for "whose 'ittle ducky is 'oo? " She is a large woman, and Rosario has not yet "got his growth." In the engagement that followed, the maiden basely deserted and the lover retreated much battered. The Senorita was shut up in her mother's house, but love will find a way. That night Rosindo broke in and eloped with his adored.

They proceeded at once to the suburb of Guagua, pulled the presidente out of bed, and told their story. He was deeply sympathetic, but declined to marry them for fear of the law. However, such a little item as ceremony makes small difference in Filipino matrimony, and they settled down to married life in the house of a friend. Senora de la Reyes heard of their whereabouts, and en ered a complaint with the authorities, calling upon them to return her child. It was a knotty point. The military regulations forbid marriage to persons under age, but these young people were not married. Quite wisely, the authorities adopted a manana policy. It worked to a charm. Having exhibited her temper for a week, having cursed us and our laws by all the saints in the calendar, the Senora suddenly relented, and took the young couple into the business. Rosindo now delivers the washing, and expects to have the union sanctioned by marriage as soon as Graciana gets old enough.

Possibly it is not Colonel Bryan's fault, but he is the most popular American with the insurgents, thanks to the anti-expansionist noise at home and the vain hope of Democratic intervention by which Aguinaldo has been bracing up his followers. I suppose that Colonel Bryan would be glad to learn that on October 29, when the rebel government held a jubilee over a phantom victory, his picture was carried in the parade and was cheered as enthusiastically as was that of Aguinaldo. Furthermore, when an anonymous letter-writer recently threatened death to certain school principal unless they removed from their walls the portraits of McKinley and Lawton, he mentioned Bryan as the one American who had earned that distinction. There is a Bryan superstition among all the Tagalos. It is a pity that they are not eligible to vote.

A Cargo of Cats.

The Dick Whittington cut story has come true out here. I will remind you, in case you have forgotten your nursery days, that the "three times Lord Mayor of London town" made his hit by bringing a cat to an island infested with rats. The transport Sumner has just brought into port a whole battalion of as fierce and expert mousers as ever trod a fence. It happened because the commissary stores had become overrun with rats. One day, General Otis voiced a wish for a few American cats. John Montgomery, a citizen of Manila, prepared to give the general a surprise. He sent $75 to Newark, N. J., to pay for 500 cats. The recipient advertised, and cleaned out half the domestic pets in Newark. Fifteen cents apiece was paid, and no questions asked. Only cats of size, strength and fierceness were wanted, Toms preferred. It created a lot of trouble in Newark and lowered the value of residence property in the neighborhood of the cellar where they kept General Otis's mousers, but eventually they were turned into the Sumner in good order. The Mayor of Newark sanctioned the movement, and gave a large Maltese with a fighting reputation to head the delegation. Soldiers who came across in the transport say that the cats gave the voyage a certain interest, but that most of their own sleeping was done in the daytime. Sunday was exercise day, when the felines were turned out of their cages to roam the deck. It was a great occasion, for the crew used to capture the largest and fiercest specimens and match them down in the hold. Three or four were lost in this way, but there were some births en voyage, so that nearly 550 were finally unloaded at the warehouse. The sentries who stood guard that terrible night say that the cats fought each other more than the rats; the "clean-up" next morning netted sixty-five dead rats, number eaten in addition not known, and eight dead cats, to say nothing of the w unded.

A private in Schwan's column brings back a story on the Chinese coolies who acted as porters with the flying column. It appears that these people regard all goods broken open as their own special property. It is a custom of long standing, and no threat or punishment can move them. Some of Schwan's coolies were unloading boxes of provisions and supplies It was several days since anything had broken open; they were growing hungry. Consequently, they handled each box more roughly than the last, until they succeeded in breaking a large packing-case. Several cans rolled out and were pounced upon. The private who tells the story saw a coolie take his can behind a bush and open it. It was filled with nice, yellow butter, a little clarified from the heat, but still butter. He smelled of it, and looked doubtful. But hunger overcame suspicion. He produced a knife, cut out a big chunk, placed it in his mouth—and—well, as Mr. Kipling puts it, "that fell which fell." His "butter" was axle-grease!

James B. Dill, the corporation lawyer of New York, is said to have received a fee of one million dollars for his work in engineering the Carnegie-Frick steel combine. Mr. Dill is a young man, and began life as a newspaper reporter. He earned his tremendous fee, for his act and diplomacy prevented the falling apart of a $ 60,000,000 combination and much costly litigation. This is by long odds the largest fee ever paid for legal services.

Alfred Harmsworth of the Daily Mail, London's sensational newspaper, has accomplished the feat of publishing a Manchester edition of his publication, identical with the original in every particular and appearing at the same time. This feat is accomplished by perfect system and a free use of the telegraph.

Great as is the Chinese talent for detail, the celestial people are strangely inaccurate in their arithmetic. There is no regular system of weights or measures in the empire, each province, often each town, having its own. A pound or a pint seems to vary according to the merchant's fancy. A Chinaman will tell you that the distance from A to B is four miles, while from B to A it is eight miles. If you press for a reason you will be told that it is because "B is downhill from A." In reckoning ages, a person who has passed thirty is forty, one who has passed forty is fifty, and so on.

THE CONTESTANTS IN THE RECENT MATCH RACE.

The University of California Crew.

BOATING IN CALIFORNIA

THOUGH the Boating Association of the University of California was founded as long ago as February 25, 1892, rowing has never taken much hold upon the Berkeley undergraduates. The purposes of the association are to encourage rowing, to provide facilities for maintaining a college crew, and to train an eight to contend against the representatives of Stanford University. The association had an excellent two-story boat-house, with dressing-rooms, baths, reading-room and other conveniences, but an unfortunate fire early in 1895 destroyed it and all its equipment. A day or two after the fire, the University crew, which had been coached by E. M. Garnett of Harvard, rowed a four oared race against a crew of the Columbia Rowing Club, trained by E. R. Folger of Yale. The Columbia representatives easily defeated the University four, made up of Dwight Hutchinson, bow; William L. Cole, No. 2; John L. Wittenmyer, No. 3; and N. C. Trew, stroke. In 1897 or thereabouts the University sent a four into a regatta held on Lake Merritt. In 1899 a junior barge crew rowed at El Campo, defeating fours of the Ariels and Dolphins. The University crew consisted of James Hopper, bow; A. D. Smith, No. 2; Ray Fryer, No. 3, and F. Waggerhauser, stroke. This crew, with Clinton Tracy in the place of A. D. Smith, took part in the Astoria regatta in August, 1899, and came back with a trophy.

It can be seen from this brief recapitulation of the public appearances of the oarsmen of the University that rowing takes only an unimportant place among the sports of the undergraduates. But it seems likely that in the future more interest will be taken in the sport. Dr. Benjamin Ide Wheeler is said to be strongly in favor of the development of rowing at Berkeley, and to desire to see intercollegiate boat races. The real cause of the lack of life in rowing is, of course, the impossibility, as things stand at present, of having contests with Stanford University. Intercollegiate rivalry runs so high between the two Californian Universities that there is little likelihood of athletic young men at Berkeley expending much time and energy on a sport in which the Palo Alto youth does not engage.

However, rowing has received a little fillip recently at the University of California. On Saturday, April 7, a crew of Berkeley young men, with a short preparation, defeated a four of the Columbia Rowing Club in a mile race on Oakland Creek by ten or twelve lengths. This victory, though quite creditable to Kington and his crew, must not be taken as meaning too much, for the Columbia representatives might fairly be described as "Four Men in a Boat, to say nothing of the cox." That is to say, they were not a crew. Messrs. Haight and Goodwin are well-trained oarsmen, far better than any others in the two boats, but they received little or no support from the men in the forward part of the barge, whereas the representatives of the University of California were very fairly together, and consequently made their boat travel, despite their numerous faults of style, due to a lack of competent coaching. It is true that L. J. Pembroke gave them his time whenever he was able, but an oarsman is not made in half-a-dozen lessons even from the most skilled instructor. As the photograph of the men in their boat shows, not one of them sits up straight, and one or two are screwing even when at rest. The stroke, and consequently all the men behind him, is slow in getting out his hands, rushes his slide, and does not leave the water cleanly: elbows are not brought close past the sides, and there is an almost total absence of "catch" at the beginning. So it is to be hoped that the young men who beat the Columbia representatives will not fall into the fatal error of supposing that they know the whole art and science of rowing a racing boat: for I can assure them that if they came for a quarter of an hour under the tongue of a good Oxford or Cambridge University coach, they would wonder whether their venturing to sit in a boat at all was not a piece of unparallelled and unheard-of presumption on their part. They won their race because they are strong, athletic young fellows, and because their opponents were even less of a crew than they, not because they know how to row. Yet any followers of amateur sport must be glad to see the University putting a crew upon the water, and hope that the love of one of the noblest recreations may steadily increase. Rowing is a splendidly healthy exercise, and interferes far less with study than track work or intercollegiate football.

ARTHUR INKERSLEY.

The failure of the Third Avenue street car line in New York makes a bankrupt of old Henry Hart, one of the pioneer street car men of New York. He is over ninety years old now, and it is too late for him to begin again. His failure was due to his inability to understand modern stock-handling and modern financiering. Hart could not read and could write only his signature, but he was possessed of great natural shrewdness. He came to New York from England in his youth and opened a pawn-broker's shop. From this, he came to money-lending on a larger scale. In the course of his business, he acquired the Third Avenue line by the forfeiture of a mortgage. The city built up in his direction, and he became wealthy. Larger concerns operating all around him combined to freeze him out. He was offered a share in the combination, but the idea of a trust was beyond him. Last year, he committed the blunder of attempting to buy up all the stock in his company when it stood at a high mark. There was a slump, and he went under. The road is in the hands of a receiver, and Hart has lost all his interests in it. He is a director by courtesy of the Pacific Mail Company, having been president of that company at one time.

Bucharest officials are conscientious. After a revision of the registration lists in that city the following notice was sent out: "Major A. Fanutza: It is hereby brought to your notice that your name is struck off the list of electors for deputies and senators in the First District and will not again be inserted in it. The reason for this is the fact that your death occurred some time ago."

IN BOOKDOM

THE APRIL MAGAZINES.

THE most important article in the April magazines is Professor Hyslop's "Result of Psychical Research" in Harper's. Pertinently, he asks: "Why is it so noble and respectable to find whence man came and so suspicious and dishonorable to ask and ascertain whither he goes?" A company of hair-raising ghost tales prefaces the article, excerpts from the compilations of the Psychical Research Society. The experiments of this organization with the extraordinary medium, Mrs. Piper, are explained in general. Then Professor Hyslop details his personal investigations, made under circumstances precluding fraud. He declares that the results leave him no alternative between spiritism and an infinite telepathy to account for the facts. He says:

"My experiments were managed with a direct view to complicating all suspicions and accusations of fraud with the responsibility of the Society's officers, and unless the public is willing to meet that challenge, it must accept the consequences. For myself, being reduced to a choice between an omniscient telepathy and communication with discarnate spirits, I simply prefer the latter hypothesis as the more rational of the two in our present state of knowledge regarding super-normal phenomena."

The initial article in the Century is devoted to a study of marmosets, with elaborate illustrations, of course. The exaltation of minor live-stock which began with Seaton Thompson's 'Wild Animals I have Known" is common to several of our great monthlies. We have had the "Biography of a Grizzly," with wide and spotted margins. Here is Scribner's with the "Kangaroo Rat" by the same eminent hand. Admitting that a magazine must instruct or amuse an infinity of individuals, why not locate the appeal to minor live-stock fanatics at the rear end of one's periodical? If the series must be extended, however, let us have "White Mice I have Known." There are people who collect this vermin. The "Autobiography of a Belgian Hare" would certainly sell edi ions in California, and incidentally in Utah. "From Pen to Pau, or the Reminiscences of a Side of Bacon," would be a sure circulation-winner in Omaha and Chicago. Other suggestions will doubtless occur to the editors of the Century, who dearly love fads and familiar names.

The Napoleonic material in the Century is still largely devoted to relating the Emperor's trials and tribulations in St. Helena. One finds much interesting table-talk—for instance, the great man's opinion of Wellington, whom he described as a "very excellent, good general. He showed a great deal of ability in the wars in Spain." "It is impossible for man not to commit some faults," he asserted; "we are all liable to it, and the general who commits the fewest in number is the greatest general; and Wellington committed as few as any." Napoleon had no confidence in a republican form of government for France. He considied the French too volatile, too much divided among themselves. He thought a monarchy very much limited would best suit the nation.

The Orient is also a favorite subject this month. Harper's has Captain Mahan on the "Problem of Asia;" Poultney Bigelow writes entertainingly of Hong Kong. Miss Scudmore in the Century describes the "Bore of Hang Chau Bay," and in McClure's I find "The American Invasion of China," by W. B. Parsons. The latter is the most important. The author is chief engineer of the American-China Development Co., and made the survey for the proposed railroad connecting Hankow with Canton. He describes conditions in a section of the Celestial Empire quite beyond the beaten lines of travel, and says he found even in the forbidden provinces shop windows displaying for sale articles with American, English, French, German and Japanese brands. In one shop were American canned goods; in another Munich beer. Mr. Parsons insists that for the development of our trade with the empire it is essential that a careful and intelligent study be made of the Chinaman and his habits. For us there is a market for tools, machinery, lamps and many other articles, but first it is essential for our merchants to understand Chinese requirements as to packing and modes of doing business. The article is one that will repay perusal by men in mercantile life to whom the ambition for Oriental trade makes appeal.

The Atlantic is cleverly enough composed, but I discern a trend towards the academic. The average professor turned editor, has much to learn of magazinedom. It is, after all, only an upper journalism and the predecessor of Editor Bliss Perry was its most admirable exponent. The "Perplexities of a College President," "Co-operation in the West," "The Political Horizon," by H. Loomis Nelson, are valuable contributions in this number. A "Comic Chesterfield" is an excellent subject wasted: A "Great Modern Spaniard" is as heavy and formless as lead ore. The latter is a subject W. D. Howells might have treated to perfection and an essay from him would have value both in style and manner of arrangement lacking in Mr. Baxter's. How much more dignified such a contribution than Howells's story about the peregrinations of a piano in Harper's. The Stillman autobiography grows in interest and really has distinction as the revelation of a strong and vital individuality.

Perhaps Lord Methuen will not care for the form of contemporary history that H. G. Whigham is furnishing to Scribner's. His account of the battle of Magersfontein is vastly unflattering to the noble British leader. Indeed he makes hay of his pretensions. To whomsoever would write of a city—of London, New York, San Francisco—I commend as a model of the way the thing should be done, Miss Tarbell's "The Charm of Paris" It is interesting, and critically informative; one is plunged at once into the depth of the subject. It is picturesque and yet not superficial, and it is well and gracefully phrased. Miss Tarbell, however, is one of the ablest writers we have; she unites the grace of good style with the arts of good journalism. The Cosmopolitan offers a hint for a study of preeminent conjurors in its article on Houdin. This especial contribution commences well but becomes soon merely a catalogue of tricks The "Babies of Chinatown" is not an adequate treatment of the subject, and the photos with which it is illustrated are all posed. We who know the charming natural pictures that have been made of the Celestial youngsters of San Francisco, realize what delightful little figures they are. Apropos of "The Poetry of Skirts," much better photos must be available of skirt dancing. If not they might be made. "The C nnoiseurs of Poverty Flat" is rather a good idea, well, handled.

McClures, on the whole, is a very well-put-up number and its stories have a wholesome American flavor, though they are not works of art. Ainslie's is entertaining and very readable and its stories are full of brisk incident. The fiction end of the April magazines, on the whole, however, is not well sustained. The James story in the Atlantic is hopelessly attenuated. "Padre Ignazio," a new departure for Owen Wister, is not in the the right vein, being too slow for the scheme. When one has read "Ikora" by Adachi Kinnosuki, "The Cherries of Ueno" in the Atlantic seems a flat failure. After all, an artistic, charming and realistic story is indeed a rare find.

The feature of the April Ladies' Home Journal is undoubtedly the inauguration of Kipling's new animal stories. At least that is the contribution which is starred and leaded. Doubtless it cost a great deal of money and may be respected therefore. Doubtless, also, it represents a triumph for Editor Bok, though I think it is at the wrong end of the magazine It belongs to the children's department and otherwise the L. H. is just a bit better than usual, which is a way of Editor Bok's, who in spite of sarcastic commentaries from less successful contemporaries is invariably up-to-date, if not showing the rest of the guild new tricks.

Appleton's Popular Science Monthly is as usual full of good stuff. A "Hundred Years of Chemistry" and the article, "Steam Turbines" struck me as especially interesting. Readers at this end should find valuable information in "Trade Corporations in China," while others may want to see Professor Finders Petrie's resume of "Recent Years of Egyptian Exploration.

In the April Lippencott's is surely one of the most charming stories of the year. "The Heart of the Ancient Wood," by Chas. G. D. Roberts. A mere expression of admiration is much less than its deserts, because it is really a work of genius. The story of the little girl who grows up in the clearing in the forest with the old bear Kloof for a playmate, is told with a rare degree of feeling and knowledge. Mr. Roberts is certainly to be reckoned with. En passant, it may be good to mention that the new Lippincott novels have all been worth reading. Hornung's story in the March number was told in excellent style and Albert Bigelow Paine's "Bread Line" was really a first rate yarn and deserving more attention than the critics accorded it.

The Review of Reviews is keeping its end up with articles on Timely Topics. The great steel makers, colitics in the Orient and fire Insurance methods have space in the April number.

OF COURSE HE WASN'T VAIN.

THEY had discussed the matter before, but the day of the christening was close at hand and they had not yet decided what they should call the baby.

"Of course," he said, "it isn't vanity that makes me want to call him by my own name—Jehiel—but it was the name bo ne by my father and by his father before him."

"That's true, Jehiel, dear," she replied, "and it's a good Scripture name, but you yourself have often said it wasn't very pretty. Why not call him after your Uncle John? He might remember baby in his will."

"John is too common, dear, and I never could abide the nickname 'Jack.'"

"We might call him Andrew, after papa."

"I don't know what your parent has ever done for us that we should perpetuate his name."

"That's not at all kind of you, dear. You know I married you against papa's wishes. Suppose we don't call him after anybody but just give him a nice, distinguished name—Reginald, for instance."

"Hu! Whoever heard of a Reginald that ever amounted to anything outside of a novel?"

"How would Algernon do?"

"Too fancy."

"I think Leopold is a nice name."

"Too Dutch."

"Don't you think Walter is pretty?"

"Aha! And so you'd like to call my son after that google-eyed idiot you were engaged to before I met you!"

"He isn't the only Walter in the world. Suppose we give him a classical name and call him Augustus."

"Why don't you burden the poor child with Julius Cæsar, Brutus, Cassius, Pompeius, Sextus, and have done with it?"

"I always liked Francis."

"Too much like a girl."

"What do you think of David?"

"Might just as well call him Moses, Isaac or Abraham."

"Richard?"

"And have him nicknamed Dick?"

"Oh, dear,—I can't think of anything else. Oh, yes! Let's call him Aubrey. That's so unusual and is so nice to pronounce"

"I never knew but one Aubrey and he borrowed ten dollars from me and never paid it back. Aubrey won't do."

"But I can't think of any more. Why don't you suggest something?"

"I did."

"What?"

"Jehiel."

And Jehiel it was.

WHAT DO YOU DRINK.

Is it Pure, Or Do You Outrage Your Stomach With Slops?

In deciding that there is no genuine Napa Soda on the market save that which is bottled by Jackson's Napa Soda Springs in Napa County, the courts have at last done something for the protection of the public stomach. For years now the cheap bars have been dispensing the cheapest kind of carbonated water from bottles similar to those used by the Napa Soda people. The crime is nothing short of forgery and counterfeiting. Of course no reputable saloonman or restaurateur would conspire to foist a spurious article on a people who are willing to pay a legitimate price and profit for the genuine, but there are thieves and thugs in every trade, and these have made it necessary for the Napa Soda people to appeal to the law. For forty-five years Napa Soda has been known as a pure mineral water of exceptional tonic properties. Now that the public and the proprietors are protected by the courts, it will cost no more to be served with the genuine article, and you may be sure of getting it at every place that pretends to sell Napa Soda.

His Terrible Cough.

Few things are so depressing and weakening as a constant cough. Few things are as discouraging as a cough that will not yield to treatment. Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery cures coughs when all other medicines fail, because it is more than a cough medicine. The cough is but a symptom. "Discovery" makes new and pure blood, heals the lacerated tissues, and gives the body the needed strength to throw off disease. It cures the cough by curing the cause of the cough. There is no alcohol, neither opium, cocaine, nor other narcotic in the "Discovery."

"I had a terrible cough something over a year ago and could find nothing to stop it, or even to do me a particle of good," writes Mr. J. M. Farr, of Cameron, Screven Co., Ga. "I chanced to see an advertisement of yours, and forthwith bought a bottle of your invaluable 'Golden Medical Discovery.' Before I had taken half a bottle I was entirely well."

BABBLINGS OF A BELLE

LENT is at last over, my dear Diary, and once more we can be as gay as we please, and entertain more lavishly. The season of abstinence did not weigh particularly heavily on my shoulders, but the reason of that I naturally fancy is owing to the numerous things in which I am interested besides real social pleasures. You see I belong to the junior auxiliary of the Children's Hospital, and that takes some time. I am a member of the Doctors' Daughters, and we accomplish a great deal in that society; and then the golf club and a number of minor affairs.

We all miss Mary Scott very much out at the links, but I suppose she is almost in Honolulu by this time enjoying life thoroughly.

Holy week, most of the Catholi and Episcopal girls kept strictly, not going anywhere nor even making calls. I think some of them really looked thin Easter Sunday. Of course,it may have been the light colored gowns and hats. I love a light colored tailor gown with a straw hat of the same hue, and Easter was just the day for that sort of thing.

The churches were all crowded for services Easter, and the music was excellent. The Catholics have such a splendid opportunity to make music almost the most interesting part of their ceremony. The preatest composers have all written masses, and in other cities mass on a special occasion is quite equal to a first-class concert. The decorations of the churches, too, were beautiful. Trinity church was most charming, so was St. Luke's. Of the Catholic churches, St. Ignatius, the Cathedral and the little church Notre Dame des Victoires, on Bush street, made me realize how flowers and candles could produce a glorious effect. The Swedenborgian church was as exquisite as ever, and the beautiful Easter sun cast its soft rays on the Keith pictures and the St. Christopher window, and, as I knelt there, I could not help wondering if I should have felt religious were I not in so poetic an atmosphere.

I do not think I can remember a more perfect Easter Sunday. As a rule the wind blows fearfully during the afternoon, but this year the "Ideal" and I sat on the hills of the Presidio overlooking the Golden Gate until after the sun had set, and could hardly realize thatwe were still in San Francisco, the air was so soft and balmy.

Saturday afternoon Mrs. Voorhies asked about thirty of us to go out on the bay with some of the Philippine Commissioners. We had a capital time, as we went all through the new naval academy on Yerba Buena; I am so glad it is no longer to be called Goat Island. This academy is really a fine affair. There were over a hundred students, for the most part fine-looking young fellows. With the training and discipline these youths receive, I can understand why we are so proud of our navy and can see its future as ruler of the sea. However, we must not be so ready to criticise a hero as we have been with Admiral Dewey. What I cannot understand is that we Americans are not hero worshippers. We approved of Dewey for awhile, but just so soon as he committed a slight blunder one and all arose to abuse him. Then he is unanimously voted merely a creature of circumstance. Now, to my mind, Dewey is a hero; he proved that in the Philippines, and his action there will go down in history as a great and fine work. What he has done since, though it may not coincide with our ideas of what he ought to have done, does not take away from his former greatness. The British never considered Nelson any less of a hero because of his unfortunate marital affairs. Why should we be so critical? Are we so perfect as a nation? But this, speaking of perfection, brings to our mind the failure of our own city government, and the absurdity of the charter, so I shall not discuss it further.

This next week will be quite gay. Monday afternoon is the concert of Hambourg and Petschnkioff, and in the evening Mrs. Downey Harvey will give a dinner to Emily Hager and Walter Dean at which thirty of their mutual friends will be present. As Lulu is one I shall tell you all about it later. Tuesday is to be the Dean tea to Emily Hager. The rest of the week is given to a few dinners to Helen Thomas, who will soon be married. Anna Voorhies sails for Europe with the Taylors of Oakland on the 5th of May. She will be a guest of her uncle, Mr. Grantland, one of the commissioners of the Paris Exposition. I am sure she will have a glorious time, for Paris will be very gay this summer. The "Ideal" and I are considering as to whether we shall take a short run over there.

MRS. W. A. LANGE.
nee Grace Geiselman, who was married at St. Dominic's Church on Monday, April 16th.

I was so glad that Mollie Thomas announced her engagement to Latham McMullin. Mollie is one of the girls that I admire; she should make one of the handsomest brides of the year. Latham and she have been the best of friends for some time. Bessie Shreve is to be the first girl who will be married in St. Luke's church. I think I should rather enjoy that She and Bob Hooker have received some of the stunningest presents I have ever seen in San Francisco. They are both exceedingly popular. Another engagement is that of Miss Olive Snider and John Merrill. I believe their romance commenced in Berkeley when they were both attending the University. Miss Snider is certainly a trikingly handsome girl and exceedingly clever. John Merrill is a dear boy; he has been a friend of mine for years.

Mrs. McNutt is to lend her home for a tea for the incurables in the Children's hospital next Saturday. There will be all sorts of things to buy, and in the evening tableaux will be presented. As all the girls will be there helping I think it should be very successful. I hope so, for there is no charity more worthy of help than this hospital.

Next week, Diary dear, I hope to be a little more entertaining, for there will really be something of interest to tell you.

Tuesday noon I went to see Bertha Russel and Eugene Lent married. I was so glad Bertha wore pink satin, because it is so becoming to her. She really looked fine and so happy, too. The house was a mass of flowers. The decorations were in fact so elaborate that it suggested a conservatory, and the sweet odor of the flowers took one to tropic climes. It was most effective, and I am quite decided as to how I shall decorate the church on the 30th, for the "Ideal" and myself. Gaelo Allen was the maid of honor; she is very pretty and has that exquisite bloom of youth we see so often in Spanish and French girls. What specially took my fancy was the bouquet of orchids that Bertha carried. Mr. Lent had them sent from all parts of the State and he must have felt when he saw how really gorgeous they were that it was quite worth the trouble. Every variety and color were represented. After the ceremony we sat down to a breakfast and had a very merry time, for every one seemed particularly happy and bright.

Later in the afternoon I went to Mrs. Dean's tea to Emily Hager. The decorations here, too, were superb. The tea was held in the big drawing rooms on the first floor, and they are just built for big entertainments. There was no crowding nor pushing though about four hundred people called during the afternoon. The big mirror at the end of the room was veiled with asparagus vines and orchids and at the side were huge bunches of apple blossoms. I just stood and looked at it, it was so startlingly original a manner of decoration, and more beautiful than any I had seen before. The room was decorated with branches of snowballs and apple blossoms and quantities of those lovely Sievers and Boland carnations. Smilax covered the doors. Mrs. Dean and Emily received the guests, and were assisted by the Morgans, Mrs. Downey Harvey, and any number of others. The refreshments met with my approval, and altogether Leila and I decided it was the most elaborat tea this winter.

MISS CRICKET.

The engagement of Miss Florence I. Beveridge, daughter of John A. Beveridge, of San Francisco, to Mr. Percy A Crump, of the Bank of British Columbia, is announced. The marriage will take place in May.

The wedding of Miss Grace Geiselman to William A. Lange, took place in St. Dominic's Church on the evening of Easter Monday and was a beautiful and unique ceremony. The church was still dressed in its Easter decorations, and the spring effect was enhanced by the addition of palms and lilies. Friends of the the two families crowded the large church. The bride introduced an innovation by dispensing with bridesmaids, selecting instead three acolytes to attend her. One was custodian of the ring; the others preceded her to the altar, their arms full of Easter lilies. There was only one maid of honor, Miss Olive Verdon, who wore a frock of pink mousseline de soie veiled over taffeta. The bridal gown was of white duchesse satin with a court train, trimmed with ruchings of tulle. The corsage had a trimming of tulle and orange blossoms. The bride carried a bouquet of Easter lilies.

Mr. Lange was formerly a member of the National League Baseball Team in Chicago, and is very popular in that city. Some of the most beautiful of the young couple's wedding gifts came from the Chicago players. The bride is a daughter of William Geiselman, the attorney. After a wedding trip through the South, Mr. and Mrs. Lange will occupy a cottage adjoining the Geiselman mansion at 1720 Golden Gate avenue.

Paradise.

One sayeth, "Surely this is Paradise
To lie close tented in her tender eyes;"
And one, "For me the nightingale and rose;"
And one, "For me the converse of the wise.'

Yea, all these things are pleasant in man's sight;
But those there are that hunger for the migh
Of silence and the brotherhood of stars
In cool, calm spaces on the mountain hight.

AT THE THEATERS

With his new extravaganza company, Mr. Morosco goes back in the direction from which he started. The Southwell Company, which changed its name but not its personel, was made up of players who were, in a limited sense, artists. Their best work was done in the classic comic operas—"The Beggar Student," Gilbert and Sullivan, "Der Fliederemaus," and the like. Yet the patronage was not up to their deserts. It was when they cheapened themselves in "Sinbad" and "The Girl from Paris" productions, in which they were not at their best, that the crowd rushed the box-office. The Tivoli, which often presented an inferior grade of comic opera, kept up its houses nevertheless. Then, the old, south-of-Market patronage upon which Morosco has built his fortune did not patronize the performances to any great degree. There was not room for two Tivolis in San Francisco, and, owing to the tendency of theatrical audiences to go where they have always gone, the regular opera audiences remained loyal to the older house. The fields crossed; it was only when the Grand people went clear out of themselves into burlesque and drew audiences from outside the regular patrons that they filled their house.

Morosco, shrewd theatrical man that he is, saw this or something like it. Hence his determination to run an extravaganza season, to lay himself out upon scenery, chorus, costumes, low comedy and—limbs—and to slight voice, acting and temperament. He had two good reasons for doing so. First, he would appeal again, although in a lesser degree, to the population south of the slot; secondly, he was not in opposition to the Tivoli. The production of Ali Baba is splendid from a spectacular view, the chorus is pretty and shapely, but outside of this, there is very little. One feels that he could enjoy it if he lacked an intellect. The classes to which Morosco is catering have responded. The great house was comfortably full for the first performance, and it was an audience somewhat like that of old melodrama days.

Well, everyone to his taste. The Grand has found its place again, and should have a prosperous season. The Tivoli will probably fill the longing for a better class of opera, after it recovers from the "Idol's Eye" spasm, and the fields of the two houses will cross but very little.

As for the Tivoli, it is keeping up to its standards. That house never had a strong chorus; this was the one point where the Grand shone pre-eminent by contrast. Indeed, the small stage of the Eddy street theatre makes the use of a large chorus out of the question. But the Tivoli has an excellent set of principals, from Ferris Hartman and Helen Merrill down the list. And there is a dash and go to its performances which gives them individuality. The size of the house, indeed aids this effect. The Grand was made for grand opera and symphony and all things serious and formal. It is hard for a comedian to get into cosy and confidential touch with his audience in such quarters. The snug little Tivoli, on the contrary, si built for the Ferris Hartman style of fun.

"The Idol's Eye," with its phenomenal run, and "Manila Bound," an unsuccessful experiment, have been succeeded by "The Wizard of the Nile," a better opera than either of its predecessors. Mr. Whelan, who was in Frank Daniels' company when the piece was first produced, has the stage direction, and the improvement is noticeable. Staging has been a woeful defect of the house in time past. Hartman, Wheelan and Schuster are as funny as ever; Helen Merrill's sweet mezzo voice is heard to excellent advantage. Annie Myers as the magician's boy assistant is both pretty and amusing.

At the Orpheum, the headliners of the Hopkins Transatlantic Specialty Company enter upon their final week on Monday, and there will be in addition four new Orpheum stars. At the head comes Digby Bell, of "Hoosier Doctor" fame. His act is classed as one of the cleanest and most artistic in vaudeville. Mildred Stoller is a comedienne who has been making a big hit in New York. Rae and Presche are also from the metropolis. Their sketch, "Too Much Woman" is said to be very amusing. Mlle. Proto was a star of the "Belle of New York" company.

Next Monday, Ward & Vokes bring to the Columbia their musical farce comedy, "The Floor Walkers," an elaboration of a sketch which they used in Chicago last summer with great success. Among the forty people in the company are some good fun-makers and some pretty girls.

For the summer season, the California Theatre is to have a farce-comedy stock company second to none in this country. Matthews and Bulger, Eddie Foy, Walter Jones, Phil H. Ryley, John Dunne, Mary Marble, Norma Whalley, Anna Boyd, Josie De Witt, the Eight Mascots, English dancing girls, and a score of soubrettes make up the aggregation. The repertoire will include all the standard Hoyt farces and a number of new musical comedies.

The second production of the Neill Company, beginning Monday evening next, is "Captain Letterblair," Marguerite Merington's pretty comedy and one of E. H. Sothern's old productions. It is a play admirably suited to the abilities of the Neill Company. On Thursday afternoon, "Captain Swift" will be given. This Thursday matinee of a piece not included in the week's regular repertoire is to be a feature of the engagement.

Miss Bessie Wall, who has been long and favorably known as a pianist, made her first appearance as a vocalist Tuesday evening in the Maple Room of the Palace. Miss Wall has a sweet and sympathetic contralto of good range and control and a sympathetic musical temperament. Among the artists who assisted, Mr. Andrew Bogart shone, by reason of his rich baritone. The audience was the largest and most fashionable one which the Maple Room has seen for some time.

"Quo Vadis" is still running to good houses at the Alcazar. It will be continued another week. Irene Everett, Mary Hampton's understudy, has had one or two chances this week in the role of Poppæa, and has quite out-starred the star.

The farewell concert of the Petschnikoff-Hambourg-Lachaume series occurs Friday afternoon next at the California. An entire new program will be presented.

THE Universities are the real homes of burlesque in this country. By burlesque is not meant extravaganza of the Rice order, with a maximum of girls, catchy music and tights, and a minimum of libretto, but the real article, the sort which flourishes in France and Germany, and consists in a satire on some play or form of play already in vogue. There is a light, bantering, extravagant spirit about college joking which adapts itself to this form. So it happens that the college burlesques of Harvard, Columbia and Pennsylvania, many of which have found their way to the professional boards, are the best American examples of the genuine form. Also, while college plays in general are as crude as might be expected, and while college acting runs through all degrees of amateurishness, college burlesques are generally written and acted in a spirit of raillerie which makes them well worth the seeing. It is a "josh," and is on the college student's own particular ground.

Shade Won't Work

It is rather late to make mention of "All but Two or Seven Dobbers Down," presented three weeks ago by the Junior Class at Stanford University; the space which must be given in this column to professional work has crowded it out. The play was the joint work of Chris M. Bradley and W. M. Erb, and was a new departure, being a burlesqued melodrama. It was a thriller of the old Morosco school, with a climax every three minutes and an inconsequential plot, full of love, persecution and blood. Of the eleven principals, seven were slaughtered in the course of the mixture, one ended up with a broken heart, and one finished in the hands of the police, leaving the hero and heroine to fall unscathed into each other's arms as the curtain fell. All the old favorite Morosco lines were revived—"Curse the puppy, there he is again!" "Are you sure you love me for meself alone and not for me hated gold?" "I remember, as though it were yesterday." "No, the carrion still lives." "I will defend her—with me life." "R-revenge!" "Mur-rder!" The newsboys and servant girls of the old Morosco audiences were represented by the college "rooters" who sat in the gallery, cheered on the hero and hissed the villain, or rather villains, for there were seven of them altogether, although two did not survive the first act.

Three of the situations were especially strained and therefore particularly amusing. In the second act, the heroine has just confessed to the hero that she loves him better than his Spanish rival. He takes the center of the stage and draws an American flag. "At Santiago de Cuba and Manila Bay the American trooper conquered the haughty Hidalgo. Once more the Stars and Stripes wave triumphant!" and the orchestra breaks into "The Star Spangled Banner." A moment more and the villains break in, seize the hero and bind him to an iron bedstead connected with the electric light wires and propose to electrocute him when the dormitory lights are turned out, two minutes later. He has but one quarter of a minute to live when the heroine leaps into the room, slaughters the executioner with a horse-pistol, and effects a rescue as the curtain falls. The third ends with a thrilling duel with bowie-knives between two hired assassins, who perish in a death-embrace as the curtain falls.

Of the actors, Mr. Kenyon as the persecuted hero and Mr. Erb as the innocent Swede, the tool of villainy, deserve mention. Mr. Riley and Mr. De Forest were the head villains, and won all the hisses they received. Messrs. Bradley, Haslacker and Strohn were lurid and awe-inspiring bandits. Misses Sobey and Zucker played the gushing heroine and the inconsequential soubrette with the true Morosco spirit.

A QUESTION OF ASPIRATES.—A maritime case was being tried before Justice Creswell of the Liverpool circuit. On one side was a lawyer named Sergeant Channel, who had a habit of dropping his h's; on the other a sarcastically polite barrister named Frederic Thesiger. Whenever Channel mentioned the vessel he called it the Ellen; every time Thesiger mentioned her he called her the Helen. At last the judge said, "Stop! What is the name of the ship? I have it on my notes the Ellen and the Helen; which is it?" "Oh, my lud," said Thesiger, blandly, "the ship was christened the Helen, but she lost her 'h' in the chops of the Channel."

A VALUABLE DISTINCTION.—An old Ulster woman, who had made money by selling whisky in a village on fair and market-days, was visited when she lay dying by a minister, to whom she spoke about her temporal as well as her spiritual affairs. "And so, Molly," said the minister, "you tell me you are worth all that money?" "Indeed, minister, I am," replied Molly. "And you tell me," continued the minister seriously, "that you made it by filling the noggin?" "Na, na, minister," cried the dying woman; "I didna tell you that! I made maist of it by not fillin' the noggin!"

x

THEY REACHED WATER.—Three Irishmen were crossing the Bridge of Cork, and one of them, happening to look over the parapet, felt a strong desire to touch the water. But they could not see how it was to be done. At last it was suggested that, by hanging on to the feet of each other, they might accomplish what they desired. They made the attempt, but found that their combined length was not sufficient to reach the water. Then the one at the top cried to the undermost, "Arrah now, Paddy, hould on till I come down to you, and then, my honey, we shall reach it!" And they did.

WHO MADE ROOSEVELT.—Governor Roosevelt, at the Lotus Club's reception to the Gridiron Club, which is composed of Washington newspaper men, proceeded to "jolly" the visitors without stint, declaring he knew them all of old. "Of course you do," remarked one of the visitors, calmly. "We made you." "I'm glad to know that," replied the Govenor. "About eighteen hundred people have communicated to me privately that they made me, but it's good to have a statement from those who, I know, always tell the truth."

x

AN IRONIC CONDOLENCE.—When a man becomes suddenly rich it not unfrequently follows that he becomes as suddenly oblivious to his old friends. Thus a Persian, having obtained a lucrative position at court, a friend of his came shortly afterward to congratulate him thereon. The new courtier asked him: "Who are you, and why do you come here?" The other coolly replied: "Do you not know me, then? I am your old friend, and am come to condole with you, having heard that you had lately lost your sight."

x

THE WAY OUT.—A sanctimonious young clergyman, who was much given to enforcing the letter of the church law, was marrying a couple. He insisted that the ring should be put on the "fourth finger." The bride resisted and said: "I would rather die than be married on my little finger." The clergyman insisted, "but the rubric says so"; whereupon the parish clerk, stepped forward and said: "In these cases, sir, the thoomb counts as a digit."

x

WILFUL WASTE, WOEFUL WANT.—At an Irish police-court a man who was known to the police as an habitual drunkard was brought up on the old charge. "Ten shillings or a fortnight," said the magistrate. "Shure, yer honner, I've only two shillings in the world!" pleaded the man in the dock. "Well, sir," said the magistrate, "if you can't pay, you must go to gaol. If you hadn't got drunk with your money you'd be able to pay the fine."

x

FRIENDLY INTEREST.—A Hebrew with sporting proclivities possessed a small sailing boat and invited a boon companion to go with him for a sail. A squall came on suddenly, and the owner of the yacht was pitched overboard. While he was struggling with the waves, his friend peered anxiously over the side, and exclaimed, "I thay, Ikey, old man, if you don't come up for the third time can I have the boat?"

x

WORK FOR TWO OF THEM.—A verger showing a large church to a stranger pointed to another man within the edifice and said: "That is the other verger." The stranger remarked: "I did not know there were two of you." The verger replied: "Oh, yes, sir, he werges up one side of the church and I werges up the other."

PALACE and GRAND HOTELS

For nearly a quarter of a century these Hotels have been the recognized headquarters for Tourists and Travelers visiting San Francisco.

Their popularity has been acquired by reason of their unique location (being accessible to wholesale and shipping districts and amusement centers), the peculiar excellence of cuisine and service, and moderate charges.

The Grill Rooms for ladies and gentlemen have an international reputation, and the recently added Supper Room is now recognized as the place to obtain after-theatre refreshments.

EVENTS CURRENT.

A Diplomatic Tilt With Turkey.

Turkey and the United States are having a diplomatic spat of some importance, and the relations between the two nations have become more than a little strained. There has been talk of an ultimatum on our part and even of a resort to arms; the American Minister to Constantinople has resigned, and the question of breaking off diplomatic relations has been seriously discussed. The trouble dates back to the Armenian riots of 1895. At that time, the Euphrates College at Harput, owned and conducted by American missionaries, was destroyed by the Turkish mob, the loss amounting to $88,000. In common with the other Powers, the United States pressed its claims, but our demands were rather more forcible than those of the others. Twice during the negotiations, so our state Department asserts, the Sultan acknowledged that his government was respousible and promised to make good the claim. He failed to do so, and when Minister Strauss went to Turkey in 1898 he carried instructions to rush the negotiations. He was victorious in some minor points, and finally secured the same promise as the one given to his predecessors. After waiting sixteen months, during which time no move toward payment was made, he reasserted the claim and was met by a calm denial of all the Sultan's promises. This led to an exchange of notes and to the resignation of Mr. Strauss,and a small war-cloud gathered. Just as the State Department was debating over the question of an ultimatum, the Sultan hedged a little, claiming that he allowed the American demands, but promised to pay them only when he stood ready to pay all the European claims in the case. This was a clever diplomatic move; it placed the Americans in the position of asking for special favors as compared with the other Powers. The only weak point in the contention was that Abdul Hamid could not prove this, while the United States had the word of three ex-ministers to the specific promise. This was followed by an official declaration from the sultan to the effect that the matter would be adjusted by the Turkish courts. As Ottoman justice is corrupt and place-serving, this amounted to a diplomatic refusal. There the matter rests. It is not probable that the Sultan will hold his position to the point of a war, especially in view of our superior navy; it is more probable that he believes us to be "bluffing" and is adopting the same tactics himself.

The War in the Transvaal.

One who would keep a weekly summary of the progress of the war in Transvaal must use up much of his space in affirming rumors and then denying them. At the time when this record closed last week, the reports had Wepener relieved and the Boers fleeing along the Basutoland borders with the natives following to attack them should they cross. This was only a rumor,in reality, the town is invested as closely as ever, and General Brabant is fighting his way to its relief. There is little doubt of his ultimate success, but the Boers will gain precious time for the Transvaal's defences. At the front, the situation is a confused one. Roberts' long-expected advance is probably yet to begin. More than likely, the Wepener affair and his natural aversion toward leaving a part of his force besieged at his own rear is the cause of his delay. The latest dispatches have it that the advance has begun, but as this has been reported and denied three times in the last fortnight, the statement must be received with suspicion. Brabant and his Colonial troops are fighting vigorously toward beseiged Wepener; if Roberts has really advanced, he must have done so in the belief that this move would be a success. Winston Churchill, the sensationalist among the correspondents of this war, reports that Roberts is spreading a net to cover the whole region around Wepener, expecting to trap the besiegers as he trapped Cronje. On the other border, where lies Ladysmith and the bloody pass of Laing's Nek, there is no movement; interest in that direction centers in the probable removal of Generals Buller and Warren, in command there. They have been severely censured in Lord Roberts' dispatches for their conduct of the Ladysmith campaign, the Spion Kop episode in particular, and their removal is almost sure to follow. In that event, Kitchener will be likely to command the Ladysmith division.

Germany and the Vatican.

A straw which indicates how the wind blows in Europe is the publication in Germany of the telegrams of congratulation which passed between the Kaiser and the Pope on the anniversary of the Pontiff's Coronation. Usually, such messages are not published; when they are, there is always some good diplomatic reason. It is not far to seek in this case. Emperor William is looking for the support of the German Catholics in the new and far-reaching measures which he is trying to foist upon the Empire. In the Reichstag, the Center has a strong Catholic tinge, and it is this very element which holds the balance of power for and against the Kaiser's pet bill—that providing for the increase of the German fleet. Moreover, Germany is seeking to make a diplomatic point against France. Recent incidents at Paris have tended to estrange the Vatican, and the German diplomatic corps at Rome has made the most of this state of affairs; skillful intrigues have succeeded in prejudicing many cardinals and prelates against France, with a view to a change in the Vatican's policy. The Pope, cool and skillful diplomat that he is, has by no means taken the attitude of his prelates. He is said to be striving, by all the quiet means in his power, to reassure the French. He has not forgotten that it was the influence of London and Berlin which excluded him, the logical peace-maker of Latin Europe, from the Hague Conference, and he knows that, should the question of the division of Austria arise, he will be on the opposite side from Great Britain and Germany, since the Vatican stands for a status quo in the Dual Kingdom.

Slow Work in Congress.

Attention has already been called in this column to the slow progress made by the present Congress in disposing of the great mass of legislation made necessary by the Spanish war. The Porto Rico Tariff and other questions which are insignificant compared with the greater problems of government of the Philippines, construction of the trans-Isthmian Canal and our future attitude toward Cuba and the contested seats of three members—Representative Roberts, Senators Quay and Clark—have taken up a uselessly large amount of time and attention. Moreover, the lists of appropriations, regular routine work which must be disposed of although other measures of larger importance have to wait, are larger and longer than ever before. The first week in June has been set by the Republican caucus as the time for adjournment, and the work for the rest of the session is pretty well mapped out. Four measures of importance now before Congress cannot possibly get past the committee stage. These are the Army Reorganization Bill, the shipping Subsidy Act, the Pacific Cable Bill and the Interoceanic Canal Bill. The Pacific Cable measure has been shelved on account of the Hawaiian compromise. The Subsidy Act has been rushed a bit lately and may possibly come up for final action, although the chances are against it. So, also, final action on the Hay–Pauncefote treaty may be taken by the Senate, but the larger Nicaragua Canal Bill must wait. The advocates of the Hawaiian Bill have some hopes of action this session. As for Cuba and the Philippines, they will be completely passed over. A strong fight will be made for the ratification of the French reciprocity treaty, but there is bitter opposition. All the appropriation bills are behind the calendar, and, as they must of necessity be hurried through, they will consume most of the remaining six weeks. All this means that the next Congress will be the most important session since the Civil War, perhaps the most important in the history of the United States.

A Bloody Period in Luzon.

There is bloody work going on in the Philippines. The Associated Press accounts are meager and give few details, but it appears that,during the past week, our army has killed and wounded more insurgents than in any corresponding period since the first few weeks of the revolt. Authentic reports, mostly official, give 378 Filipinos killed, 12 officers and 244 privates captured, and a proportionate number wounded. On the basis of the common ratio between killed and wounded in action, it is not too much to say that the total native loss exceeded 1000. The Americans lost nine killed and sixteen wounded. This slaughter was caused by aggressive insurgent movements in all the provinces of Luzon. General Prodel Pilar, reported killed, has reappeared in command of a guerilla force in San Miguel. After harassing the Thirty-Fifth Infantry for some time, they hazarded a night attack and were repulsed. The natives killed and wounded in this attack are not included in the totals given above, but the loss must have been considerable, as the Americans made effective use of a machine gun. The Thirty-Seventh bore the brunt of another bloody fight in the Nueva Caceras district. The Seventeenth Infantry added to the week's totals by rounding up 180 insurgents in South Luzon, including General Montenegro. The rest of the fighting consisted of small skirmishes, unimportant taken alone, but each adding its mite to the totals. All hope of a speedy ending to the revolt might as well be abandoned. The coming election alone should be enough to keep the natives active through the rainy season, as the hope of Democratic success and corresponding intervention is now Aguinaldo's trump card. Yet, in spite of this, the official reports stick to the old "well-in-hand-and-rebellion-practically-over" fiction. A bulletin issued by the War Department on April 24 states that organized resistance is over, the only natives now in resistance being robber bands, with whom our troops have little trouble. Resistance will die out gradually as these forces are caught and broken up. The very day before the issuance of this bulletin the telegraph brought the news of the bloody week as an unintentional commentary on its untruth.

Chinese Opposition to the Conservative Reaction.

The internal administration of China in in a very bad way, if we are to believes the telegraphed reports from the European consulates of the kingdom. It is generally believed that the Empress Dowager is preparing to get rid of the deposed Kwang Hsu, whose life is a thorn in the side of her regime. All such reports should be doubted; the doings of the Imperial Circle at Peking are veiled from the outside world by a rigid censorship. The rule of the Empress and her puppet appears to be hateful to the Chinese people, and the invention of such stories is only natural under the circumstances. But this chafing under the new reactionary government is one of the most surprising thing in the whole situation. It was thought that China as a whole was against the former Emperor's European notions and that the return to conservatism would be popular. The reverse is true; China has apparently acquired a taste for Europeanism. There has been rioting, sedition and bloodshed in every part of the Empire. Part of this is doubtless due to the rise of the "Boxers," that powerful secret society which the Empress favors and which does its work by violence, but the main cause is a widespread popular opposition to the return to darkness. It is a hopeful sign for China and the Chinese.

The New Armored Cruisers.

The naval construction board has just completed details for three new cruisers authorized by Congress last year, viz.: the California, the Nebraska and the West Virginia. Although called cruisers by courtesy, they are in reality formidable battle-ships, with the speed of an ocean liner. Never has such a powerful battery been mounted afloat as the ones they will carry. Each will have sixty-six guns, divided as follows: main battery, four eight-inch rifles, fourteen six-inch rapid-fire rifles; secondary battery, all rapid-fire, eight fourteen-pounders, twelve three-pounders, four one-pounder automatic, four one-pounder single-shot, two three-inch field guns and two automatics. The influence of the Spanish war is shown in this heavy armament, since it was proven at Santiago that "weight of broadside" is a very important consideration. The influence of our late conflict is also shown in the increased space given to magazines. The new cruisers will carry 400 tons of ammunition each. The naval constructors have not forgotten how Dewey drew off at Manila Bay, ostensibly for breakfast but really to renew his ammunition from the supply ship. Again, the rapid combustion of the Spanish ships under our withering fire has not been forgotten. The lower decks are to be covered with linoleum, all wood-work will be reduced to a minimum and fire-proofed, the magazines covered with non-conductors of heat and cooled by refrigerating apparatus, and a fire main laid below the protected deck. These will be the most heavily armored cruisers afloat. Every square inch above the water-line is to be protected. The belt will be six inches thick over the boilers, tapering to three and one-half inches at either end. Above this belt will be a five-inch casement running the ship's length and protecting ten of the six-inch guns. The turrets of the eight-inch guns will be six inches thick, the conning tower nine inches, the deck protection four inches. The speed is to be unprecedented in vessels of this power. They are to travel twenty-three knots an hour on triple screws, and will have a steaming radius of 7,000 miles. The only point in which a vessel of this sort is inferior in fighting-power to a first-class battleship of the Iowa or Oregon type is in defensive protection. The bull-dogs of the navy are more heavily armored, although their superiority in this respect is not very great, and they sit low in the water, making poor targets. But in weight of metal thrown, in mobility and in immunity from fires, the cruisers of the California type are far superior to the best battleships of our Spanish war. Their weak point as pure fighting-machines is to be their height above water, a fault made necessary by the speed requirements. The exact specific tions have not yet been given out by the naval board, so that constructors are not able to draw up estimates and bids. Plans for the battleships Pennsylvania, Georgia and New Jersey are also in course of preparation. These will be as greatly in advance of their predecessors of '98 as the California will be in advance of the Brooklyn or the New York.

British Industrial Supremacy Menaced by America.

The London Times has just finished an investigation which is a matter of the greatest importance both to Englishmen and Americans. Realizing the growing competition of American manufacturers, and the importance of this rivalry to England, where manufacturing is the supreme industry, the "Thunderer" dispatched a commissioner to this country to make an investigation. The results are summed up in a forcible leader which takes an extremely pessimistic point of view as regards the future chances of English manufacturers. Briefly, it holds that the same factors which have contributed to the inefficiency of the British army in South Africa are hampering the work of the industrial army. The British let their army system deteriorate because of the firmly rooted English idea—"We will muddle through somehow." Secure in this belief, the British are permitting the active and "hustling" Americans to crowd them out of some of their industrial strongholds. There is a firm rooted idea in the British mind that it is undignified to hurry or to make extreme efforts in any direction. The reverse is true of America, where he who does not strain every nerve is looked upon with contempt. Besides this, America possesses natural advantages not to be overlooked. The proximity to waterways and easy and handy coal supplies constitutes the most important of these. Still another factor is the American genius for invention. No Yankee lets human hands do work which can be done by a perfected machine. Again, the trades union system prevalent in the United Kingdom is calculated to ruin individual initiative in the workman, making him only a driven member of a herd. In America, on the contrary, every laborer puts all his individuality and brains into his work. Englishmen who go to America find themselves very seriously handicapped by this difference. It is the very distinction between the Boer private, who is not only part of an army but is a general on his own account, and the British soldier who, although just as brave as his opponent, is yet inferior because he has no initiative.

Rise of the China Trade. It has been expected, all along, that 1899 would be the banner year for American trade with the Orient, but the statistics just compiled and issued by the Treasury Department show an advance even more gratifying than was hoped by the most sanguine. In the period from June, 1898, to June, 1899, the increase in our general trade over the former fiscal year was about nine per cent; the increase in trade with China and Japan was thirty-eight per cent, and to the whole Orient, forty-four per cent. Never in the history of our commerce has exportation in any one direction gone up so fast. Besides that, the conditions have been rather unfavorable. Japan's imports from the Occidental nations were seriously affected by a new protective tariff, so that her trade with all the European nations fell off during the period. The United States alone had an increase in that direction. The most gratifying feature of all to residents of the Pacific Coast was the fact that flour, shipped exclusively from Pacific ports, sold better than any other single commodity. Nearly six million dollars' worth of flour went to the Orient last year, as against four million dollars in the previous year. The growth since 1893 has been phenomenal. At that time, our annual export trade with Asia and Oceania averaged about twenty-seven million dollars. In 1899, it rose to seventy-eight million dollars, and the Treasury experts prophesy that by the end of the fiscal year 1900–01, it will come close to one hundred million dollars.

Popular Election of Senators.

SHALL the federal constitution be amended so as to vest in the "people" the power of electing United States Senators? The House of Representatives has declared affimatively upon the question, and now in the language of the street, "it is up to the Senate." From journals of the Examiner type we may expect from this time on a deal of clotted nonsense, and, doubtless, in the end the amendment will carry and be grafted on the Constitution. The movement holds many of the elements of clap-trap that make for popular approval, but its success will add nothing to the dignity, nothing to the wisdom, and nothing to the respectability of this august body.

"Election by the people." What does the phrase mean, and wherein does it better present conditions? Compare the list of Senators California has sent to Washington, through its legislators, with the list of Governors that have been "elected by the people." Surely the choice of the legislature is infinitely more creditable than that of "the people." There is no comparison, and why? Because in the matter of Governors "the people" have no part in nominating party candidates, because no one is responsible. The boss controls the nominating convention; the voter enters a booth and secretly casts his ballot; Who is there for the people to hold responsible for wrong? That indefinite thing "the party," and that is all. Strangely enough, reformers who agitate in favor of good government in municipalities favor the taking away from the people of the power to elect many officers heretofore chosen by "the people." Why? Because it makes for better government, because it fixes responsibility, because it takes the selection away from political bosses who behind closed doors in the rear of ill-smelling groggeries make up a "slate" for the dear people to elect; because it places the responsibility in the hands of one man who must act openly, in the broad day-light, and who cannot dodge or evade the punishment that goes with a discreditable selection.

"Let the people elect the Senators?" And how, pray? The municipal political bosses of both parties will go to state conventions with their mob of followers just as they do today, and will control senatorial nominations just as they now control gubernational nominations. They will give the people two candidates,one from each party and you may vote for either one of them or leave both alone, just as you choose. If bad men are choosen, who will visit the punishment, and upon whom will they visit it? If a member of the legislature votes wrong, if he misrepresents his constituents by supporting a dishonest or a bad man, he signs his political death warrant. There are plenty of cases in this state where members of the legislature, who have been recalcitrant in this respect, have been ostracized socially and politically. The present system may not work to prefection, but it is immeasurably superior to the proposed innovation. "Dead-locks"are cited as offering a reason for making the change. "Dead-locks" are nearly always evidence of an honest struggle by honest legislators against some threatened wrong. The man is new to politics who declares that "election by the people" will be an end to the use of money. It will do no such thing. It will put large sums of money in the hands of political bosses to control nominating conventions. That is what it will do. It will have a strong tendency to add a new character of corruption. It will strengthen that enemy of the republic, the boss, the practical political, the fellow who makes a business of the game.

It is no crime against the law to bribe a delegate to a nominating convention; it is a felony to bribe a member of the legislature. If bribery is practiced where the act is felonious, think of the condition that will exist where there is no penalty attached.

A Vice-Presidential Possibility.

THERE are many indications that the Vice-Presidential nomination on the Republican ticket may come West. Men wise in such matters say the Vice-President will be selected from the "far West." News from Washington indicates that the Western man whose name meets with the most favor among party managers in the East is Irving M. Scott, builder of the "peerless Oregon" and Dewey's flagship the Olympia. The strong points in favor of Mr. Scott are an intimate acquaintance with President McKinley and most of the great party leaders, who not only know him but respect him for his ability and worth.

He is known the length and breadth of the land as the man upon the integrity of whose work this nation looked with anxious eyes when the Oregon was steaming from San Francisco to Santiago. He is the man who, by the marvelous performance of that vessel, proved to the American people that every bolt, and plate, every piece of mechanism in her noble hull was put there in honor, and who, if elevated to high place will carry with him the same honorable purpose that has guided the huge undertakings of his private life.

Mr. Scott holds intelligent and decided views on the question of expansion, and, what is more, he has the ability to give public expression to them.

He is essentially a man of the people. He rose from the ranks. Was a poor boy, born in Maryland. Served his time in the machine shops of Baltimore and rose inch by inch, step by step, until he has become one of the largest employers of men in America.

He will represent all that is good on the Pacific Coast, all that makes for progress, all that makes for broadening and enlarging the commerce of the Pacific. He holds to no narrow and restricted views, the entire Coast is his field, and the handiwork of his shopmen sail in every sea and every clime. With Mr. Scott in the Vice-Presidential chair, the Pacific Coast would have in high place an honorable, representative man willing and anxious to serve its every interest.

If the Pacific Coast will show some unity of purpose in this matter, it may secure the prize, or it may fritter away the opportunity working at cross purposes, and as usual securing nothing. An admirer of Senator Perkins recently urged that gentleman to allow his name to be used for this nomination. Senator Perkins, after looking over the field of possibilities, answered as follows: "I beg to say that under no circumstances am I candidate for the position o Vice-President, nor would I accept it if tendered to me which, of course, there is not the least probability of. I should, however, like very much to see some Pacific Coast man upon the ticket, and among the many names that have been mentioned I know of none that would bring more strength to the ticket than Irving M. Scott. He has a national reputation as the builder of the battleships Oregon and Olympia. He is a mechanic, identified with the interests of the Pacific Coast States, is a gentleman of education, character, wealth and influence."

One Dead Man—and his Estate.

IF a man skilled in figures should set down with reasonable accuracy the amount of money James G. Fair, has cost the state through litigation—the tax payers would be astonished, while the beneficial results would, fairly estimated, amount to nothing.

In his lifetime, Fair was a suspicious, crafty, and not altogether lovable man. He hated in a compact, quiet, insistent, unforgiving way. To stealthily punish another, to secretly wound an enemy, to mercilessly squeeze a rival in some financial deal, brought to him that species of internal pleasure which other men experience in doing good. He was essentially a man who accomplished results by indirection.

If under compulsion he was bound to perform a given thing that was distasteful to him, you could reckon that he would throw every imaginable obstacle in the way, that legal ingenuity could devise to defeat performance. He was a man who refused to be driven. His deal with the officials of the Southern Pacific Company developed the fact that he was a tireless "waiter." He constructed the narrow guage road to Alameda and Oakland and Santa Cruz, and though the venture did not pay he waited and waited until approaches were made to him to sell, whereupon he exacted a contract from the corporation that stands as a model of shrewdness and determination. He was anxious to dispose of the property, but he never permitted that anxiety to get beyond his own keeping.

He was tireless once embarked in an undertaking. With him the end justified the means to a great extent, and the obstruction offered by a mere legal inhibition would not deter him from a colorable right, upon which he would put up as pretty a fight as one would want to see. Constant familiarity with the contentions over mining locations, had cultivated in him a litigous streak, and one which no doubt served him well on some occasions.

During his lifetime troubles arose; separation, divorce and a breaking up of family rapidly followed each other. Disagreements sprung up between himself and his children which were never fully mended, and which he imported bodily into his last will. Apparently it was his determination not to permit his offspring to divide or come into the enjoyment of his property. To accomplish this he "gave, devised and bequeathed" the bulk of his property to three trustees. "To have and to hold" the same in trust with full power to sell any part thereof, to invest and re-invest money, to erect improvements, to lease, to borrow and loan money, and in fact to exercise all of the powers of absolute ownership so long as any of his own children survived. Upon the death of the last of his own children, the trustees, under the will, were to convey one-quarter of the remaining property to the children of one daughter, another quarter to the children of the other daughter, etc.

Heavy penalties were attached to any attempt to break the provisions of this will. There were ample legal grounds upon which to base an action looking to the defeat of such a trust as that sought to be created. The law expressly prohibits their creation. They are against public policy; and, in this case, will operate to tie up an immense estate for the lifetime of people yet in early womanhood. However, this matter is still before the courts, and is scarcely a proper subject for public comment, notwithstanding its great public importance.

The contestant in the case at bar is a son of Fair. He is struggling for a right. Principles of private law would find no application if no one were brave enough to defend them or demand their enforcement. The concrete legal right that belongs to him, and is now threatened, belongs to all society, and in defending it he defends society and demands the enunciation of the principle. Every man, in his place, is called upon to defend the law, and he is a coward who lies down while his rights are threatened with invasion.

It is easy to imagine a man of Mr. Fair's temperament consulting his lawyer as to the disposition of his property in just such a manner. Even though such an attorney skilled in the law should declare it to be illegal, he might well take the stand: "It will keep them out of the money for a good many years, even though they defeat the will in the end." Such a sentiment would fit well into his character. Meanwhile the penalty falls on the courts and the State as well.

The Constiution and the Flag.

THE United States flag flies in Porto Rico as the emblem of sole authority. What constitutes the only basis of United States authority, jurisdiction and control? The Constitution. Why? Because it is the Constitution which creates the machinery of our government, viz.: the Executive, Legislative and Judiciary. Outside of the prescribed prerogatives of this instrument, the organic law, none of the said branches of our government can exercise rightfully, i. e., constitutionally,one whit of authority. There is no warrant by the Constitution for appointment by the Chief Executive of the United States of a provincial governor as the ruler of any part of the United States. Governors of states or territories are chosen by the people who are to be governed.

President McKinley, and sundry members of his cabinet as well as various Republican Senators and members of the Lower House of Congress, have declared that Porto Rico is as much a part of the United States as any state or territory of the Union. Said President McKinley, speaking to a vast assemblage of Methodists at Chatauqua a few months ago, "Our flag does not mean one thing in the United States and another thing in Porto Rico."

Does the flag in the United States symbolize anything else than is made governmentally operative by the Constitution? No. Is this true as to Porto Rico? No. Why? Because it has been declared by President McKinley and a majority of Congress that the Constitution is not extended to Porto Rico. This is tantamount to the creatures saying to their creator, "Stand aside, we are greater than thou; we can go by our own dictum where thou canst not go, and we can exercise authority beyond that which thou hast given to us."

Talk about the Constitution not following the flag! The truth is, the flag may not go unless sent by the Constitution, because the flag represents the Constitution.

JOHN AUBREY JONES.

The American Chamber of Commerce at Manila has petitioned President McKinley, asking a substitution of American for Spanish laws regarding taxation in the Philippines. They claim that the tariff duties imposed under our rule is especially irksome.

In spite of the work now being hurried forward on the new underground street railways in New York, the existing companies propose to spend about $10,000,000 in improvements this year. The change from cable to electric motors will consume most of this sum.

Reforming San Francisco.

THE impression prevails among intelligent citizens that the opportunity of reforming which the municipal administration possesses under the new charter is being frittered away in the enforcement of blue laws. While I have always striven against the diverting theory that San Francisco is the wickedest city in the world, still I must admit that it is no Sunday school. Located on the jumping off place of America, its original population composed of adventurers from all over the world, it ranks today as the pleasure city of the Coast. For the prospector, the mining superintendent, the prosperous rancher, the oil man who has made a strike, it is the place to go for recreation. He is too far from New York, and the climate of Chicago he does not care for. In San Francisco are the opportunities and facilities for enjoyment lawless or lawful. This has been so for half a century and it is ridiculous to commence restricting it at this time of day. Shearing down partitions in high-class saloons will not abate vice but merely change its abiding place. No one imagines that the morals of San Francisco are purer because the dens of Dupont street have been closed. By all means shut up the dives where men are robbed and drugged, the waterfront pitfalls where maudlin seman are maimed and plundered. Intelligent reform makes haste slowly and moves by degrees. I have been told that the Police Commission proposes to stop smoking at the Orpheum, at the Olympia and at Fischers, and that drinks shall not be served at places of amusement. A set of Sunday laws are next in order, I presume. But one end may be anticipated to all this, an absolute sweeping from power of the Democratic party and a Republican victory at the next election. It is a sporting and pleasure loving populance here. Ten years hence it may take itself and its joys more grievously; but reforming police commissioners will be content, if they know humanity and their constituents, to do one thing at a time.

Major Runcie's Dilemma.

MUCH curiosity is expressed by the many friends in San Francisco of Major J. E. Runcie, in regard to his alleged difficulty with the administration anent strictures in the North American Review on the system of government in Cuba. On leaving San Francisco in 1898, Mr. Runcie went on to Washington and there caught the war fever in its severest form. He joined an Ohio regiment and though he did not see any fighting, he was soon sent for by his friend, General Wood, to assist in the direction of affairs in Santiago. Though but little was heard of Runcie during this period, no one who knows him will doubt he did yeoman's service and that at least half the kudos and credit lavished on his superior for the able and intelligent administration of the province were due him. I imagine no one would be quicker to admit as much as General Leonard Wood. Major Runcie is an extraordinarily accomplished man. He is a first-rate lawyer, an artillery officer, a teacher of mathematics, a strong and vigorous writer. He is deeply versed in the Spanish language and laws and withal is one of the truest and most loyal men alive. In character aggressively independent, he does not mince words in his expressions. Curious how fate plays tricks with men. There are few abler, more earnest or more honest men in America than Runcie, and, given the opportunity, he must have won the highest individual distinction. Yet his brain and grit have gone to the making of another's reputation. Not that he would grudge anything he might do for one who had been his friend, comrade and physician, but such is life. When the history of the American occupation of Cuba comes to be written, due credit will have to be given this modest major of Ohio volunteers.

While in Cuba, Major Runcie has borne the title of Counsel to Governor Wood. On the various reform committees created he was the only American, and it is said that the reports of these committees have been shaped according to his ideas. From his conception of the needs of Cuba will spring the new scheme of laws and taxation in the island. The article in the Review expressed his opinions, but was not intended, I am told, to appear over his signature. A man of strong views may wish to set current a line of thought with which it would be premature or indecorous to identify himself. He may write thereon with the understanding that the publication shall further the contribution. The articles one finds in certain of the English magazines signed with a nom de plume are often sent in by men of high official position whose career would be ruined if the views expressed were formally set over their names. The episode may be a temporary interruption to Major Runcie's career, but his many friends will not permit that it seriously retard it.

Some Shafter Tactics.

THE subject of Major Runcie reminds me of his indignation at the removal of the headquarters of the Third Artillery from the Presidio to Angel Island. Of course, the station on the reservation is essentially an artillery post. There are the big guns, and, according to the laws of the game, there should the men be who have the handling of them. Prior to the retirement of General Graham and his Fifth Artillery from the Presidio, the latter was invariably an artillery station. His departure left Shafter senior colonel and he, tired of the old stamping-ground on Angel Island, where he had passed so many weary and neglected years, manipulated it so the Presidio was converted into infantry quarters and the First moved its bag and baggage to the happy hunting ground of the reservation. It suited the comfort of Shafter, but from a military standpoint it was an unreasonable and inexcusable move and thoroughly censurable. Strong opinions were expressed in The Wave on the subject, but the agitation was suspended by the outbreak of the Spanish war. Ever since, the Third Artillery men have been trying to get back to the Presidio. With Shafter in charge of the Department and Alger at Washington, this was difficult, but finally General Miles, who had acquiesced in the initial change, was induced to take the artillery view of the case and his influence with Secretary Root brought about the order recently promulgated converting the Presidio again to artillery purposes.

Seattle's Advantage Over San Francisco.

THE great distinction between Seattle and San Francisco consists is the formers attitude towards the great corporations which make it their terminus. In the Sound city there are no yellow journals to obstruct enterprise and abuse and nulify the promoters of commerce. The arrival of J. J. Hill in Seattle is the signal for editorial compliment and conjecture as to what the great man may have done, this time, for the benefit of the common cause. C. P. Huntington comes to San Francisco and the Examiner and its contempories begin a campaign of basting and sarcasm. Here is a man—one of the greatest financiers of the world, absolutely in control of thousands of miles of railroad and an infinite power for the good of the state—instead of honoring him, as the Seattleites do their greatest man—the press dogs bark and bite and snarl. Why does not the Chamber of Commerce or the Merchants Association rise superior to this influence and invite Mr. Huntington to tell what he is doing for the advancement of California? Why not solicit him publicly to suggest to San Francisco how she may best take advantage of opportunities? He is not one of our stall-fed millionaries, but a great thinker and projector, and a very wise man. Commercial problems have been the study of his life, and we can well afford to ask this octogenarian wherein the salvation of California lieth. I imagine his dictum would not be complimentary, but it would be suggestive, far-seeing, and, above all, practical.

Pensions for a Forgotten War.

LOOKING on the peaceful present-day Siwash of domestic habits and unsavory diet, it is hard to realize that the government is about to pension the veterans of a Siwash war, but such is the case. Time was when these savages were the scourge and terror of the Northwest, and the early settlers of the Seattle region had as much trouble with their neighbors as did the pioneers of the Eastern coast. Washington is nearly as old a State as California, but was far more sparsely settled in the beginning. Consequently, the struggle with the Indians of the Sound was carried on against tremendous odds. At one time, all the tribes of Eastern and Western Washington rose up and besieged the handful of whites, and were it not for the timely arrival of an old wooden warship, the settlement must have been wiped out, and there would be no present need for pensions. The big guns drove the Indians back and saved Seattle, but the war in Washington and Oregon lingered on until 1856. Many of the pioneers carry scars from these conflicts, and all who were hurt in this forgotten struggle will be remembered on the pension-list. As the payment begins from the day of disablement, these Washington veterans will have a snug sum to help them through their declining days.

A San Franciscan in Switzerland.

SAN FRANCISCO engineers and street railway men lately accomplished the feat of building and operating a street railway line in Corea, the last country on earth where such an enterprise would be thought practicable. Now, news comes that another Californian, Mr. Henry Butters, is revolutionizing the street railway system of the city and Canton of Geneva, Switzerland, a district where a tramway construction has been almost as far behind as in Corea. Mr. Butters is an old hand at the business, having planned and constructed tramways in South Africa and Mexico, as well as in the United States. He saw a chance in Geneva, secured control of sixty miles of ancient car-lines, formed a company of local capitalists, and proceeded at once to the construction of electric lines on the trolley and underground systems. A line ten miles long will be in operation June 1. The plans of the company embrace a ninety-five mile system capitalized for three million dollars and serving a population of about 120,000 people. San Francisco "gets a move on" once in a while.

New Uses For the Automobile.

A MOVEMENT of some interest to the Pacific Coast is reported in the current number of Harper's Weekly. The Automobile Club of America, at its recent anniversary dinner, broached a scheme for two great national highways suited for automobile traffic. The first is planned to run from Florida to Portland along the Atlantic Coast, the other, branching out at right angles, will have termini at New York and San Francisco with way stations at Cleveland, Chicago and Denver. The promoters of the plan do not propose to compete with the railroads; they urge the use of automobiles as vehicles for pleasure tours. The difficulty about a trans-continental trip on a railroad is the fact that the tourist must follow the routes and schedules of the road. He can stop over only at certain stations and then only at certain times. In an automobile trip, on the contrary, one may start and stop about where he wills. An automobile is slower than a railroad, it is true, but it is faster and more pleasant than a bicycle. Besides this, the machines are bound to improve in speed, comfort, "range" and convenience. The automobile of the future will be to the horseless carriage of the present as the modern safety bicycle is to the old high wheel of 1880. The great practical difficult yet to be overcome is the fuel supply. The best machines made nowadays cannot run more than fifty miles without stopping to recharge their motors or to take on fuel. This would make a transcontinental trip extremely unpleasant to-day. But modern ingenuity ought to overcome even this difficulty.

New practical uses for the horseless carriage are developing continually. It promises to solve the railroad problem in many isolated districts where a railroad proper would not pay. A railway must go to the heavy initial expense of putting in track and road-bed and must keep it in order; an automobile needs only a fairly smooth and level country road. It cannot stand much of a grade, and can never be of service in hilly or mountainous regions, but it will surely be a boon to the prairie country. Another use is suggested by a late flurry in the University town of Palo Alto. Here, lines of "busses," drawn by horses, have always been employed to convey visitors and students from the town to the University, a mile and a half away. The owners of these lines, who hold a monopoly of the business, have lately raised prices, and the residents are debating between an electric line and an automobile service. An investigation has proved that the automobile would be infinitely cheaper and more convenient. The heavy traffic between the town and the college comes only four or five times a day; during the rest of the time, there are practically no passengers at all. An electric tramway would have to keep its plant going and its current running all day; automobiles would use power only when traffic was heavy. In similar cases, as when a town acts as "feeder" for a near-by factory, the horseless carriage would show the same superiority. The possibilities are infinite.

President Hill and the China Trade.

ALL doubt as to the intentions of the Great Northern railroad toward the city of Seattle was removed by the late speech of President Hill before the city's Chamber of Commerce. His program, as outlined there, is such as to assure the destiny of the Queen City in relation to the Oriental carrying trade. Briefly, he plans to make a bid not only for the carrying trade now passing across the Pacific through the Coast ports, but a great part of the traffic which goes to the Orient via the Atlantic and the Suez canal. He intends to do this through co-operation between the Great Northern and the new line of giant freight steamers which his company will put into operation next year. These freighters are no dream. Three of them, capable of making fifteen knots with a 20,000 ton burden, are now building. To accommodate them, the Great Northern is putting in immense docks, which will cost half a million—all this to be spent in Seattle. Moreover, the accommodations for the railway lines which will have their termini in the city make a large figure in the calculation.

All the Pacific Ports are awakening to the importance of securing this great and rising trade with China, Japan and Oceanica, but Seattle is, perhaps, the farthest advanced in actual preparations. While Seattle will have Portland and San Francisco as strong competitors on the Coast, the chances against the Atlantic ports are all in favor of the West. From the Atlantic manufacturing cities, it is 15,000 miles to China via Suez. By way of the Pacific Coast, is is 11,000 miles. It is true that the Suez route is by water all the way, and is therefore cheaper mile for mile. But the Pacific route is cheaper per ton of freight, owing to the shorter distance and to the saving of canal tolls. More important still, the Pacific passage occupies about three-fifths the time of the Suez trip. Should two firms in Pittsburg ship steel rails to China simultaneously by the two different routes, the one using the Pacific line would lay down its product in Hong Kong some two weeks ahead of its rival. This is an advantage not to be overlooked.

Various agencies are operating to secure this trade for San Francisco and Portland; in Seattle, it is mostly Mr. Hill's work. It is hardly unnecessary to emphasize the importance of his operations to the Sound region. Outside of the natural products of the district, Seattle has two great sources of present and future prosperity. The first is the rise of the Alaska mining region, to which the Queen City is the natural inlet; the second is this spread of Oriental trade. Without belittling the mining resources of Alaska, I may still assert that it is an unstable dependence. No one knows how much gold there may be in the Klondike or Nome countries, but at the utmost it cannot last forever. The time must come when Dawson and Nome are only deserted sites, counterparts of the abandoned mining villages in California. Therefore, any prosperity coming from traffic with this region is on the "boom" order; it has its place, but it is not permanent. On the other hand, this rise of Oriental trade means so much that the possibilities are beyond calculation. Our Oriental commerce has been rising with every succeeding year, and our prophets declare that this is only the beginning. The United States is placed more advantageously for the China trade than any other Caucasian country; Seattle is correspondingly as well placed as any other city in the United States. Mr. Hill's work may be greater than even he himself is aware.

A VISITOR FROM FRANCE.

PHOTOGRAPHING THE JOLLY CREW OF THE CRUISER "PROTET," IN SAN FRANCISCO HARBOR.

THE FRENCH protected cruiser Protet, now in harbor for a long visit, lies off the Folsom-street dock in sociable reach of the Iowa and the little transport McCollough. She is a heavy, black, dangerous-looking craft, with a wicked air about her. The French navy runs to this characteristic. All their modern craft have the same massive appearance, an impression enhanced by the black paint of the hull and the guns. The Iowa riding at anchor a few fathoms away, spick and span in her white-and-buff peace paint and her shining brass trimmings, looks to be the great floating watch that she is, but gives no such impression of power. Yet the pride of the American navy is a battle-ship, more powerful in every way than the Protet, which pretends to be nothing more than a second-class cruiser. The layman, unversed in the fine distinction between ship and ship, would look at the two vessels and swear that the Frenchman could blow the American out of the sea. Her hull rises high out of the water and seems made for strength. The stacks and funnels, painted white for relief, are low and stocky. The black guns, with their one shining nickle band, peep out from the darkness of the hull with an appearance of strength and reserved force. It is a sight calculated to inspire terror in the foes of the Great Republic.

It was wash-day when three Americans of us went aboard, commissioned to photograph the vessel and crew. Lines of blue and white striped jerseys, such as one sees in paintings of Brittany, hung from rigging to riggirg, flapping in the fresh morning breeze, and the decks and sides were dotted with men engaged in the eternal domestic duties of a warship—painting, holystoning, polishing. The jacky who took my card up to the Commodore sat down on the gangway while he waited for an answer and chatted confidentially, trading his extremely bad English for my school French. He was a dark-skinned, heavy-handed boy, with that same refinement of feature and lack of expression which one sees in the peasant studies of Dagnan-Bouvert. When he lifted his feet to pass up the gangway, he walked with the clumping gait which is eloquent of sabots. Withal, he was a very jolly sea-dog, and I thoroughly enjoyed our talk, although it was carried on mainly with hands and eyes.

The captain's secretary came, presently, and was "charmed" in true French fashion He is a count in his own right, they told me afterward, although his rank is only that of a midshipman. The sea-dog walked up to him without the faintest suspicion of a salute, and began to chat in an easy manner. There was none of the distant and formal attitude which the common sailors of our navy are supposed to hold toward their officers. It was the first glimpse of the paternal system of government which seems to prevail on board the Protet and is said to be the rule in the whole French navy. The noble midshipman was very polite in school English which matched my school French and discounted it. This did very well so long as we were trading compliments and inquiring about one another's health, but when it came to practical details we were lost. The midshipman summoned another officer, a huge man with a strong face and a double-pointed French beard. He, too, mixed himself in a maze of prepositions and accents, and we were in a bad way. The midshipman gave an order, and a small, blonde seaman approached his superiors with the same easy familiarity which I had noted at the plank. The situation was explained to him. The seaman turned to me.

"Hello, pardner," he said, "what can I do for you?" The day was saved.

The newcomer proved to be first-class signal-man Le Merre, an ex-American who has herded cattle in Montana and mined in Colorado, and then gone back to his own Brittany to do his required naval service before settling down. The officers retired, and Le Merre became our guide and master of ceremonies

Above decks, the Protet appears much like any other cruiser, differing from our own only in space and in a few minor matters of detail. It is the crew which furnishes the main point of difference. Conscripts one and all, placed in the navy instead of the army, because they happen to be seafaring men, they represent every type of Frenchman except the Parisian. There are Normans with fair hair and complexions burned brick red in the sun, swarthy men of the Midi, with fine, black eyes and expressive gestures, quiet Bretons of the two types, light and dark, which tell of their mixed ancestry. One and all, they are picturesque fellows, Frenchmen of a different sort from any we know as American immigrants. Here, we have only the city dweller; the peasant, the sailor, who loves his native soil and stays with it to the end, is rare in America.

We were a mild sensation on board, and Signalman Le Merre, master of ceremonies, revelled it it with a true French love of the theatrical. This, ah, this must be taken. It was one of the finest guns in the world, and had such a crew! Would we like to have a fencing-match on deck? No trouble at all, none at all. The fencing-master was one of the greatest professeurs in all France. We should see him in action! The Commodore's cabin? Certainly, he would see that we had permission. Ah, and we must have the commander's cook. Such cooks! Surely we must have them! And should he have the watch drill on deck? No trouble at all, they would be glad to oblige us!

And so we moved from point to point, with a curious crowd at our heels. Photography became the craze. Half the crew hurried below decks to comb their hair and get on their shoes in anticipation of a possible chance. We had "taken" a crew of American seaman a few weeks before, and had succeeded only after a struggle. The Anglo-Saxon instinctively avoids a display of personal vanity as he avoids all other outward signs of emotion. He really wants to be in the picture, but he would die rather than show it. He must be wigged and pleaded with, and when he is finally induced to face the camera he must be hauled around and posed. Not so with these Frenchmen. The trouble lay in keeping outsiders out of the photograph. At one point in the proceedings, we found two Bretons with faces which would have made a painter weep for joy. They were lined up beside a gun, and three men who had not yet been honored found instant business polishing that piece of artillery. It took all the wiles at the command of Signalman Le Merre to get them out of range. As for posing, we had to tone down rather than suggest. They struck becoming attitudes naturally. Once, when we were about to snap a group of engineers, the master of ceremonies approached us. "We have been thinking, sir," he said, "that it would be very beautiful if each man carried the implement of his trade. If you could wait just a moment, we would be pleased—" and then there was a rush below decks for the "implements of their trade."

Plates ran low before the crew was half satisfied, and we withdrew to the commodore's cabin, comfortable quarters just over the stern, gay with the floral gifts of San Francisco's French colony, to whom the visit of the Protet is a great event. Commodore Germinent is one of the most distinguished Frenchmen that ever visited San Francisco. Commander of the Pacific Squadron—a position equivalent to that which Dewey occupied before the Spanish War—he has held many posts of responsibility in official France. He was in command of the Cruiser Pothuau, when she was sent to Russia to cement the France-Russian alliance, and it was in his own cabin that the agreement was signed. He has been on the official staff of two presidents—Faure and Cassimir-Perier—and enjoyed the strong personal friendship of the former. Were he in evening dress at an official reception, one would pick him from a thousand others as a naval man; there is an air of the sea about him. Withal, he is a thorough Frenchman, with a perfect, if distant, courtesy and infinite tact. San Francisco may yet look back and recall the time when Germinet visited the harbor, since he is a young man for the position he occupies and has a strong chance of gaining his admiral's flag before he retires.

The commodore being stowed away on the sensitive gelatin, we went back on deck to gratify the crew with the rest of the plates. The sensation had increased in our absence, and we were nearly mobbed. Custom had given rise to familiarity, so that they joked with us, back and forth, through the master of ceremonies. One of their pleasantries needed no translation. They had caught the phrase, "all right," by which the photographer signalled for quiet, early in the day. Thereafter, it was hurled at us from every quarter and in every variety of accent. Whenever a group was ready for the shutter, the men would bring it out together with the "team work" of a college yell—"al-ll r-right!" The master of ceremonies felt called upon to explain.

"You must not mind my countrymen," he said. "They sometimes make the joke, just like you."

The sun was getting low over the harbor; the brass-work of the Iowa was glinting under the level rays, and the ship's cutter drew up to carry us ashore. Signalman Le Merre had passed the word that the cruiser was to be photographed as a whole, and such of the crew as had business on deck crowded the rail for the last chance. Our master of ceremonies accompanied us to the gangway. He looked across the gleaming water at the Iowa and smiled:

"We had some of those fellows aboard here yesterday. We gave them some wine—" the smile broadened as he added: "The Americans are not used to wine; is it not so?"

WILL IRWIN.

THE CALIFORNIA ORANGE CROP.

A RECORD-BREAKING YEAR FOR THE GOLDEN FRUIT.

THE CALIFORNIA orange crop broke all records in this, the banner agricultural year for the United States. The yield, all told, will come to something like 14,500 carloads, or nearly 4,500,000 boxes. Last year's crop came to 9,000 carloads only, and the year before, a dry season, the record was about 1,000 loads short of that. The lead is not only in quantity, however. The size and quality are far above the average, and the prices are the best known for ten years. The total value of this crop will be about $4,600,000.

It does not take the memory of an old-timer to recall the period when orange-growing in California was an infant industry, as much a new thing as the oil boom of to-day. Twenty years ago, Florida was the recognized source of American oranges; fifteen years ago, the California product was just forcing a way into the Eastern markets, a dozen years ago, oranges began to have an established place among the standard products of the Golden State.

Oranges were planted in Southern California as early as the beginning of the century. The first trees were grown by the Spaniards from seed brought from Spain and Mexico. These trees and their descendants still grow in the old gardens of the South, producing a small and inferior grade of fruit. But they were never considered by the Spanish as a commercial venture; they grew around the houses, thorny and untended, while the ranchmen of the big haciendas give their attention to wool and hides and cattle and other products which required less care and found an easier market. For seventy years, there was no further development of the industry; indeed, it would have been impossible to do anything, since there was no means of getting the golden fruit to market in good condition. In 1870, John Wolfskill of Los Angeles planted the first real grove. But at this time there were no railroads in the Southland and the venture failed because the crop could not be marketed. A few years, later the Agricultural Department at Washington sent a few genuine navel ships to Riverside.

The railroad was within reach by that time, the new fruit proved superior to the old seedlings, and many ranchmen of the Riverside country became orange growers. The project appeared feasible, and a mild craze ensued. In 1884 and 1885, about four thousand acres were planted in oranges. Land suitable for the new departure rose steadily, increasing to twenty or thirty times its old value. This partook of the nature of a boom, and was followed by the usual fall in values. The inflation reached its height in 1888, when a drop occurred and prices gradually settled to a reasonable rate. In the meantime, the pioneer orchards were coming into bearing, and California oranges were making a reputation abroad. The industry spread until the fatal year 895, when $2,000,000 worth of fruit was nipped by frost in one night. The ruin of the standard Florida crop by the same agency in the following year did much to revive the industry. It created a demand for the California product and taught Western growers that some discouragement was to be expected in every orange region. Since that time, the crop has steadily advanced. A gradual increase is to be expected for several years now, as some of the largest groves planted are just coming into bearing.

There is no doubt of the permanent value of a good orange grove, rightly conducted, but the industry has its risks and discouragements at the outset. Many small fortunes and some large ones have been sunk in land which gave promise of growing good fruit, but which has lacked some requisite or other. Farmers have planted splendid groves too far up in the foothills only to find that the frost would prevent the trees from being steady bearers, or they have depended upon an inadequate supply of water, without a plentiful supply of which there can be no hope of good product. It is a delicate fruit, and exacting in its requirements, but once a grove is established in a favorable locality, there is no crop so sure and profitable. The pestiferous scale which was once a terror has been fought to a finish and will probably make no more trouble; the chief danger now is from frost. Even that peril is removed in some orchards by various mechanical devices. On the famous Everest grove near Riverside, there is a frame-work of laths covering the whole orchard, so that the trees may be covered whenever the thermometer drops near to the freezing-point. At the same time, a mechanical device is arranged to ring a signal bell whenever the mercury drops suspiciously low. In this way, a recurrence of the calamity of 1895 is avoided, on this tract at least.

The orange harvesting season is now past its busiest part for this year. It began in December, was at its high tide in late February and will go along gradually decreasing up to June, when the late-bearing Mediterranean sweets are all in. It is a busy time always, and has been all the busier this year because of the big crop. A peculiar commercial system prevails in the Southland. The buyer purchases the ripe fruit on the trees at a contract price per box, and sets his own pickers and packers to work. The responsibility of the grower ends as soon as his fruit turns golden among the leaves. The ripe fruit is carried to great packing-houses and put in shape for carriage to the East. Everything which has to do with the transportation of the fruit—boxes, crates, labels, carriers—is manufactured here. The crop comes in by the wagon-load, is sorted into various sizes and cleaned by machinery and wrapped and packed by the deft hands of girls. Being boxed, weighed, labelled and sealed, the fruit goes to the cars. The man whose task it is to pack the boxes aboard the cars is the most important employe of an orange-packing establishment, for upon him depends the preservation of the product en route. If he pack too closely, it may rot with heat or be nipped by frost in the passage across the great mountains. On the other hand, he must get every box possible upon the cars. The car loaded, ventilators are adjusted, and California is through with the golden fruit.

The total investment in California orange groves foots up to $44,000,000. Most of this is in small tracts, there being only a few large groves. Although a few trees are grown in nearly every county of the State, orange-raising as an industry is confined to the seven southern counties. There alone is the soil and climate suited to their proper cultivation, and there alone is there a minimum danger of frost. Many growers believe that this great risk may be removed by the cultivation of a hardier species, and certain nurserymen of California are experimenting with that end in view.

Estimates based upon the statistics of the Agricultural Department show that the capital invested in farming in this country amounts to $17,550,000,000, a gain of a billion and a half since 1890 The harvest of 1899 figured about two billion dollars in cereals, tobacco, hay, cotton, beet root and sugar cane. There was the largest wheat crop recorded for ten years, and only once in the ten years has the oat crop been excelled. Notwithstanding these heavy crops, prices remained good, largely owing to foreign demand. When amount of product and size of crop are both taken into consideration, it appears that cotton was the most profitable crop of 1899. There was also a boom in hay and live stock. In value of agricultural products, the Unites States leads the world. Russia, Germany, France, Austria and Great Britain follow in the order named. The growing market abroad has had a great deal to do with the increase in agricultural values. The statisticians say that one most encouraging feature of this advance is the fact that, while farming capital has grown so rapidly, the farming population has increased but little. In other words, the money has gone into the ventures of farmers already in the field and not into the new ventures of immigrants.

BABBLINGS OF A BELLE

IN WHAT a series of weddings we are indulging my dear Diary. Each one makes me take myself a little more seriously. When I hear the Minister of God say: "For richer for poorer, for better for worse, in sickness and in health," I actually find myself shivering. It is terribly solemn, particularly when one is going to be married oneself in a very short time. But, I suppose if it were not a solemn affair, we should be more careless as to the man we married. As it is, loads of girls mistake infatuation for love. I wonder does one really ever recognize the "real thing" until after one is married? These last weddings have been particularly attractive. I envied Bessie Shreve being the first bride in St. Luke's Church. It was such a beautiful morning. St. Luke's seems to me in every way suitable for weddings. Bessie looked very well, she was a little pale. I hope I shall be, it looks well. Her gown was of this new stuff, "pom," and there is no material of which I have ever heard that looks so nice as does this. It was, being very heavy, plainly made and trimmed with some beautiful old lace belonging to her mother. The bridesmaids Minnie Houghton and Anna Grey also looked well. Bob Hooker and Bessie are very popular. All their friends, who are not to be counted in less than hundreds, wished them such happiness and seemed so sincere in their friendship, that I think they are a very fortunate couple.

Most of the people here are rather disappointed that Mary Crocker has announced her engagement to Francis Burton Harrison, son of the authoress, Mrs. Burton Harrison. We all hoped in a sort of way that she might marry a San Francisco fellow. But I suppose the East has also attractive young men. Mary is only eighteen, and this has been her first season. My advice to her could have been to say she would marry him in a year if she liked him as much as at present. At eighteen, one frequently likes a fellow that would hardly be even ordinarily congenial for a friend at twenty-one. Mary, however, has a pretty level head on her shoulders, so I suppose she has thought the matter well over. Mr. Harrison is exceedingly nice looking, and is clever and a good fellow and a particular friend of Mrs. Alexander's, who, I believe quite approves of the selection her niece has made. It is so pleasant to marry a man whom one's family likes; one never learns any of the faults then of one's fiancee. But become fond of a man that one's family think a poor match, and not the kind for you to marry—then the poor young object of one's affections is not only sure to tire of one in a month, but is so abounding in faults as to be hardly fit to live. I have been through it all, so know pretty well what it is.

I went to a large luncheon at the Hush's in Piedmont last week. It was a jolly affair given to Florence Sharon. She is a really charming girl and is very musical. Most of the girls were from Oakland, but I was near Eleanor Davenport and Annie Voorhies, and more I know well, so we had a good deal of fun. The Hushs had a very artistic set of tables decorated in fruit blossoms, Fleur-de-lis of blue, and gold and other flowers. I think there were about forty girls there. The Hopkins' girls gave a luncheon to Helen Thomas and her bridesmaids on Friday. Helen is very much liked; she has had more entertaining than almost any girl I know. She is jolly, good fun, and one of the most natural people I have ever met.

Notwithstanding that for the past fortnight the Iowa has been in the bay, we have seen but little of the officers. Mrs. Kautz and the admiral have been in San Rafael, but I have not heard much of the men except that the admiral said they were rather short, so the officers would have but little time ashore. It is too bad, for they were only here until Monday. Then they sailed for Puget Sound, I believe. The French Man of War is in port and several afternoon parties have been formed to go abroad. I, however, have been too busy to attend any of their functions. Leila says she likes some of the officers, and it is such fine practice for French, though most of them speak English with a fascinating accent. Leila is very much fonder of foreigners, I think, than most girls, but that is probably owing to her having been educated abroad.

Edith Stubbs had fourteen girls to luncheon on Thursday, and gave them a capital time. They were all good friends, so had lots of fun discussing engagements, weddings and where they intended spending the summer. I am quite surprised how few girls have been to the concerts of Hambourg and Petschnikoff. Hambourg is a boy and yet plays wonderfully. I simply could not be induced to miss any of the concerts. Petschnikoff is a Russian. The violin is an instrument I think that lots of people enjoy more than the piano, yet the houses were not particularly well filled. There is to be another concert on Friday next.

WALTER L. DEAN.

On Tuesday afternoon I went to see Emelie Hager and Walter Dean married. It was a lovely wedding. The house was decorated with quantities of greens and apple blossoms and carnations. It was a veritable spring wedding and one of the prettiest of the season. As I stood in the drawing room looking around at all the flowers and girls, I honestly wondered which had been the prettiest wedding, Bertha Russel's, Bessie Shreve's or this one. I have not yet made up my mind, but I really believe it was this last. Emilie's gown was of duchesse satin and stunning lace. I never saw her when I thought she looked better or happier. There is no other girl I know who has a more classic profile than Emilie. Alice, and Ethel Hager, Helen Dean and Daisy Van Ness were most charming as bridesmaids. They wore white mull over green organdie slips. The effect was so fresh amidst all the spring flowers. Mr. Downey Harvey was the best man and Hugh Tevis, Ned Greenway, Allan St. John Bowie and John de Ruyter were the ushers. The ceremony was performed in the gold and white drawingroom. The bay-window having been made into a chancel for the occasion. The big gold cross from the Cathedral was surrounded by high candlesticks. The decorations were all pink and white flowers. It was a superb effect and seemed almost like a church. Father Ramm, in rich sonorous voice, read the service, and it is impressive. Emilie answered the responses in a clear voice. I do not think she was a bit nervous. I really have never seen two people who seemed happier to be married. Mrs. Dean wore a pink and white moire gown, the skirt paneled with lace and finished with small tassel buttons of black and pink. Mrs. Morgan looked well in blue, Mrs. Timothy Hopkins in grey; Mrs. Downey Harvey was at her best in a tight-fitting black velvet embroidered in silver dots. She has such a figure, and it did show off to such advantage. Mrs. Joe Tobin was in white and so was Mrs. George Pope, both of whom looked very well. All the girls looked nice, but I particularly noticed Therese Morgan, Lillian Follis and Helen Hopkins.

Such presents! Oh, Diary dear it is good to be a popular girl and to marry into a family as well liked as the Deans. I have never in my wildest moments expected to see such an array of handsome things. Presents from Europe, the East and South and, of course, San Francisco. I do not see what they will ever do with so many.

The wedding of Willis Polk and Mrs. Christine Moore was, of course, artistic. It could not have been Willis Polk's without being that. The vestry of St. Ignatius was wher was performed. It was charmingly decorated by Miss Kittie Donahue. I think I shall ask her to submit her ideas to me for my great event. It is getting painfully near to that now. Fancy next Monday at noon.

The Unitarian Church was a beautiful affair as the girls marched in on Wednesday at noon in front of Helen Thomas. Addie Murphy and Hattie Kimble in light pink, Charlotte Field and Therese Morgan in a brighter shade of the same color, and Ruth McNutt and Edith Preston in a sort of pale cerise. They represented pinks of the sweet pea, and carried bunches of that flower. Ruth McNutt was at her best, I simply could not take my eyes off her. Mollie Thomas was decidedly the American girl in her "Dresden frock." "That girl is the real thing," the "Ideal" said to me, as she passed up the aisle. Then came Helen, her color a little paler than usual, but with that happy, cheerful expression that makes her so dear to all her friends. I do not think there was a man there who did not say to himself "Kimble is a lucky fellow." Helen's dress was white duchesse satin with a great deal of Renaissance lace. It was most becomingly made. Now, I must tell how beautiful the church looked. The Worn girls did the work. It was so entirely different from anything I have ever seen that it quite amazed me. One side of the church was a mass of white wisteria. Just the way one sees it in Japan, one of the girls told me. Not a leaf to be seen, just branches upon branches of flowers. On the opposite side was a veritable hedge of pink hawthorn. The chancel had palms and pink hawthorn, and it was altogether a great floral effect. The church was crowded with all Helen's friends, and it was altogether a most successful wedding. Afterwards we went to Helen's for breakfast, and had such a merry time of it. She forgot to ask the "Ideal," so I had a capital time with Mr. Kimble's brother, who is, I think, just a bit crushed on me.

Just think of it, the next wedding will be my own. I am not a bit nervous, though; I think I have accustomed myself to marriage seeing so many weddings lately.

Well, Diary dear, this is my last letter as your babbling friend, but as soon as I recover from the new sensation of matrimony, I shall write to you from the point of view of the "young married woman." In the meantime wish me all luck, and Leila will try to tell of my wedding and the other things that take place until I return.

MISS CRICKET.

DR. PIERCE'S Favorite Prescription

"I am so grateful to you for your advice," says Mrs. Sidney B. Oakes, of Whitmell, Pittsylvania Co., Va. "When I commenced your medicines I had been treated by different doctors for three months or more, but would only receive partial relief for a short while and then would be worse than before. Was confined to my bed most of the time. At the time I commenced your treatment my left side was completely paralyzed. Had no desire to eat anything; bowels costive all the time. Nerves were all unstrung, so I could not bear the least noise. I also suffered from diseased ovaries and female weakness. But thanks to my Maker and you, after following your advice, I am able to do all my washing, sewing and house work in general. I haven't had a spasm in two months. Left off medicines about one month ago. Didn't think it necessary to continue them longer. I have taken about seven bottles of Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription, seven of the 'Golden Medical Discovery,' and two vials of 'Pleasant Pellets.' I heartily recommend those medicines to all suffering as I was."

The Inter-collegiate Field Day.

A. C. Plaw, U. C.'s Phenomenal Hammer-Thrower.

A Preliminary Heat in the 100-yard dash.

Dr. Jordan Looks On.

IT is the invariable luck of the two California Universities to draw a cold, dismal day for the annual inter-collegiate field-day. Last Saturday was no exception to the rule. No bleaker, nastier weather has ever descended on the Stanford campus. There was a bad wind down the back stretch, so strong as to hamper all the distance events, and the officials in the infield stamped and smoked in the effort to keep warm. Men, like horses, make their best speed on still, warm days, and no records could be hoped or expected on such an afternoon.

Stanford was "easy" for the Berkeley men. The cardinal showed to the fore only three times. McCaughern took the short sprint, Boyd beat Hoffmann, the blue and gold crack, in the pole vault, and Hamilton, a new man, showed to the fore in the mile run. Everywhere else the University of California led, winning by a score of 84 to 33. In spite of the lop-sided score, most of the events were closely contested. In the mile, the 220-yard dash, the quarter and the mile walk a handkerchief would have covered the leaders at the finish. The quarter, fought out by Drum and Smith in the face of a wind which fairly beat the air out of the athletes' lungs, was as pretty a race as one could wish to see. Hamilton's mile, run under the same discouraging circumstances, was necessarily slow, the slowest ever done in a Stanford-U. C. field day, but its finish, when Moser fought the winner all the way down the home stretch, was one of the most exciting bits in the day's sport.

The contest this year had an added interest, because of Berkeley's proposed trip to the East. It was expected that this contest would give a line on the strength or weakness of the U. C. team. It did not, because of the unfavorable weather. Nevertheless, the year's training has proved pretty clearly the individual capabilities of the various men. The reckoning shows that the team is a poorly balanced one, and not the equal of the aggregation of 1895, which made such a good record at the Mott Haven games of that year. It has often been shown that the East has improved immeasurably since 1895, every record having been broken one or more times in the past five years. To meet this, Berkeley should be able to send out a team better in every respect than the former one. The fact that this cannot be done during the present season makes the proposed Eastern trip a very doubtful experiment indeed.

As compared with the 1900 team, the old U. C. aggregation of 1895 was superior in the hurdles, the sprints, both jumps, the quarter and the half, leaving the present team only the weights and the pole vault. Man for man, the comparison stands about as follows: In the sprints, the old team had Scroggins and Barnes, as against Drum and Cadogan of the present day. Scroggins was a ten-second man; Drum, at his best, never equalled that time and he is far from his best this year, as his defeat of last Saturday shows. The lanky sprinter, who promised, in his early days, to become a second Wefers, has not recovered from his army experiences. His limit in present form is probably about 10 2-5, slow time for the East and impossible time for the big intercollegiate games. Cadogan may be counted out on the same figures, as he has never shown the ability to defeat Drum.

In the hurdles, the U. C. enthusiasts are relying on Bakewell. At the very top of his performance, this athlete can about equal 16 seconds in the high hurdles, with time a little slower, proportionately, in the low. This was world's record time eight years ago, but now it is a rare Eastern college which has not a man who can equal it. Krantzlein won the event in the last Mott Haven games at 15 2 5. In the team of 1895, Torry and Dyer were good for 15 4-5, and Torry was proportionately faster in the low hurdles. Score two more events for the old team. This year's aggregation has no high jumper; that of 1895 had Patterson, who was good, when crowded, for an even six feet. In the broad jump, Broughton would be one of the best men in the country could he regain his old form. Two or three years ago he was jumping at Coast record distance, and was dangerously near to the world's best figures. He has seemed to deteriorate ever since. In last Saturday's field day, he made 21:2 on his first attempt, but failed to surpass 20 feet in five subsequent trials. Woolsey (the elder) of the old team, was a consistent performer at 22 feet, a figure which Broughton could easily surpass should he ever regain his lost form.

Koch could cut into fifty seconds in the quarter and ran close to two minutes in the half mile. The former is supposed to be Drum's best event, yet he never showed any such time. In the latter, Woolsey (the younger) may yet equal the Coast figures, but his time does not show it so far. No one mile man was taken with the Eastern team, that event being usually forfeited in dual meets. This year's team is in the same plight. Berkeley has two good walkers, but they cannot be used this trip, as the event has been abolished in the East.

Plaw in the weights is the one bright, particular star. He is probably the best hammer-thrower among the college men of the country, no exception being made. In the East, he would have McCracken of Pennsylvania to beat, but he is doubtless equal to the task. Plaw is a wonderful athlete in his way. He is built for his event—mightily muscled where muscle is needed for hammer-throwing, slim where muscle would be superfluous. He is close to world's records now, and ought to equal them before many years. His work with the shot is not so good, but he might possibly show "inside the points" at Mott Haven.

The other point of special excellence in this season's team is the pole-vault, wherein "Jack" Hoffman is good for eleven feet even, although he failed seven inches short of that in last Saturday's games. The team of 1895 had no pole-vaulter, so that there can be no comparison. For the East, however, this is just fair. Five men qualified at eleven feet in the Mott Haven games of last year; two men were still in the event when the bar was raised five inches higher. Hoffman could win in many of the dual meets, but he could hardly hope for a place at Mott Haven.

Why not wait until next year? At that time Deo voluntate, two of the best young athletes in California will be in the University—Henley of Ukiah, who has approached the world's record in the high jump and the Coast record in two other events, and Thomas of the same school, who has the form and speed of a world's record hurdler. The best of this year's team, including Plaw, its one surpassing star, will then still be in college. Besides, there are several Freshmen in training at Berkeley, whose work shows that much may be expected of them next year. It is the task of a friend to warn the students of the University against making such a trip with the present team.

The excellent photographs of the meet are the work of Emerson Warfield, an amateur. They are worthy of special mention in view of the fact that the day was dark and windy, conditions generally fatal to good snap-shot work.

THE ETERNAL FEMININE.

THE veil was black and soft-meshed and delicately perfumed. It lay on the sidewalk in front of a Fourteenth street store where Mr. Broadway could not avoid seeing it when he glanced down to inspect the tips of his recently polished shoes. Mr. Broadway was not a particularly curious man, but mechanically he stooped and picked up the silken web. He looked it over carefully to make sure that it was in good condition, then, seeing it was without flaw or blemish, he stuck it in his pocket and went on toward the shop where he was to meet Mrs. Broadway and accompany her to luncheon.

In the excitement of looking for his wife and selecting desirable seats in the crowded restaurant Mr. Broadway forgot all about the dainty trifle in his pocket, but hardly had the luncheon gotten under way when he was reminded of its existence in a very disagreeable manner. He put his hand in his pocket for his handkerchief and drew out, in its stead, the silken veil. Mrs. Broadway saw it even sooner than he did, and her eyes narrowed ominously. Mr. Broadway's mind was on the alert, however, and before she could utter one of the many words that fought for supremacy, he handed the veil across the table and said, with a fine asumption of carelessness:

"Here, Kate, is a veil I found a little while ago. It's as good as new and a very pretty pattern, I think, so I picked it up and thought I'd take it home and give it to you."

The veil dangled temptingly over Mrs. Broadway's soup plate, but she did not seize upon it with the avidity that might have been expected. Indeed, she did not even look at it' but glared hard at Mr. Broadway and said, angrily, "Miser."

Mr. Broadway's hand dropped then and the veil swayed dangerously near the soup line. The retort pained him. It was unexpected. He had reckoned on the possibility of recriminations for disloyalty, but to be accused of parsimony took the wind completely out of his sails.

"Now, see here, Kate," he said, "this is going it a little bit too strong. I'm not close-fisted and I'm not mean and selfish, and to have the epithet of 'miser' hurled at me is more than I can stand. Just look at that veil a minute. What's the matter with it?"

Mrs. Broadway took the bone of contention gingerly between her thumb and finger, then, after a superficial inspection, she rolled it up into a little wad and tossed it across the table toward Mr. Broadway.

"To think," she said, "that I should ever come to this. To think that my husband would sink to the level of walking the streets looking for stray veils which he brazenly gathers up and asks me to wear. It makes no difference that the veil is unsoiled and untorn. That is not the question. It is the principle of the thing that hurts me—the insult. I never thought when I married you that the time would come when you would ask me to wear cast-off garments which you had picked up in the street. If you can't afford to clothe me say so. I've never raised a row, have I, about clothes that I wanted, but couldn't have because you were short of money? I'll not be apt to do so now, either. But if the time does come when I must have things with which you cannot supply me, I'll simply pack up and go home to mother, that's all. Only, whatever you do, don't make me a present of second-hand clothes—especially veils. Why, how do you know who has worn that thing? And it is not a particularly fine one, either."

"Isn't it?" stammered Mr. Broadway, meekly. "I don't know much about such things, but I thought it seemed very nice. I'm sorry. I didn't mean to offend you, Kate, and I don't think it is just the proper caper to rip a fellow up the back this way."

Mrs. Broadway was already relenting. She became sufficiently mollified before they separated to promise to forgive and forget the offense, but Mr. Broadway, not wishing to take any chances on the efficacy of verbal apologies, bought theatre tickets for the evening, hoping by means of substantial repentance to eradicate any lingering germs of resentment and effect a reconciliation.

Mr. and Mrs. Broadway occupied orchestra chairs at the theatre that night. They were never in a hurry about rushing off after the final fall of the curtain, and by the time they had donned their wraps and made their way to the foyer the crowd had pretty well nearly dispersed, and the lobby and aisles were well-nigh deserted. As they were passing the box office window, Mrs. Broadway stopped short with a sharp cry of "Oh, look there," and before Mr. Broadway could realize what she was about, she had stooped and picked up some object from the lobby door.

"What's the matter?" he asked.

"Somebody's dropped it," she said.

Mr. Broadway caught his breath audibly.

"Great Heavens!" he cried, "it's a veil!"

"Of course it's a veil, said Mrs. Broadway. "And a beauty it is, too. How lucky. I'v been wanting just that kind for ever and ever so long, but I didn't feel as if I could afford to buy one."

She held the thing up and shook it out anxiously. It was part cotton, it was perforated by at least seventeen holes, and the ends were frayed, but she seemed not to notice those defects. Carefully she folded it and placed it in her opera bag.

"That kind of veil is so becoming," she said.

Then Mr. Broadway spoke.

"Well," he said, "if you aren't enough to try the patience of an angel! Why, that veil isn't half as good as the one I found this afternoon, and you wouldn't even look at that!"

Mrs. Broadway tilted her chin at a higher angle and quickened her pace a trifle.

"Oh, well," she said, "that's a different matter entirely."

And Mr. Broadway supposed it was, but he couldn't for the life of him see how. N. Y. Sun.

The recent decision by the courts that there is no mineral water entitled to the name of Napa Soda save that bottled at the Jackson's Napa Soda Springs, is of as much benefit to the consumer as to the bottler. The cheap bars have long been handling the cheapest sort of carbonated waters put up in bottles made in imitation of those used at the Napa Soda Springs. Now you may be sure of getting the real article every time you ask for it, for the law is plain and the penalty is high for the imposter. There is but one Napa Soda and that is Jackson's. For forty-five years it has been known as a pure mineral water of remarkable tonic properties. Only the worthless waters, foisted on the market by unprincipled dealers, have made it necessary for the Nada Soda people to demand protection from the courts.

BOERS vs. BRITISH.

AN ANALYSIS OF THE CONTENTIONS OF C. W. VAN DER HOOGT.

MUCH has already been written along partisan lines of the struggle in South Africa; and there are still partisans to hear from. The latest partisan account of the trouble is a compliation by one Mr. C. W. Van der Hoogt, under the title The Story of the Boers. Mr. Van der Hoogt, in addition to being a close personal friend of President Kruger, is an American citizen and a neighbor of the Van der Bilts in New York. He publishes "under the authority of the South African Republics;" which means doubtless that the South African Republics are his bankers, or at least guarantee the printers' bills. The introduction is written by Mr. Montagu White, recently consul-general of the Transvaal at London; and the plan includes the text of such official dispatches, proclamations, and statements as will help the Boer cause, in the judgment of the compiler and author. Mr. Van der Hoogt himself excels in the vituperative abuse of England. He does not, unfortunately, excel in clearness of style and consistency of thought. His exposition and argument for the defense is a little overdone. In his anxiety to make points he makes too many. He is like the Irishman who "wasn't in the room when the shooting occurred; and if I was, I didn't have a gun; and if I did, I didn't fire it off; anyhow, it was self-defense." Mr. Van der Hoogt asserts the Boers never to have been subject to England; on the next page he proves that the convention of 1884 freed them from England's rule; and anyhow the convention of 1894 by implication conceded their independence. Taxation of the Uitlanders was never oppressive; and if it was, it was for their own good; and anyhow the Uitlanders themselves forced its necessity upon the Boers. The Uitlanders by right were denied the franchise, since it was not their country; they were too immoral to vote; the Boers had already arranged for them to have the franchise. And so on.

The object of the book is very frankly stated in the paper by Mr. White. That gentleman thinks that the United States ought to intervene by force of arms. He thinks that a mere threat of war would bring Great Britain to terms; but if it didn't, the United States could whip her anyway. He has a great contempt for the objections that Americans urge to such a course; and especially for the Monroe Doctrine:

"With regard to the Monroe Doctrine, as a stranger I must confess to a sense of bewilderment as to its application. I read in one newspaper that the Philippine policy is a violation of that doctrine. In another I find it stated that the Nicaraguan treaty drives a hole through the Monroe Doctrine as effectively as a canal would pierce the isthmus."

Mr. White continues most naively that since he doesn't understand the Monroe Doctrine, he doesn't see why that ancient tradition should prevent the battleship Iowa from sailing up the Modder river and whaling the tar out of Lord Roberts unless he quits shooting at the Boers.

"I plead my ignorance on this point is excusable, and I trust I shall be pardoned if in my enthusiasm for my cause I reject the argument as unworthy, and dismiss the Monroe Doctrine as an effective obstacle to the performance of a benevolent action."

Which is what an American would call "plenty of gall," to be sure, coming from a foreigner.

Mr. Van der Hoogt is the first American citizen, so far as I know, to justify the system of slavery practiced by the Boers before the British stopped it. He is certainly the first American to execrate the British for having stopped it, and for having stopped the cruel raids of "the white aristocracy," as he calls his friends, into negro territory for slaves and plunder.

"When the Dutch government made way for that of Great Britain in 1806, and, still more, when that change was sealed in 1814, the little settlement entered upon a new phase of its history. Notwithstanding the wild surroundings and the innumerable savage tribes in the background, the young Africander nation had been welded into a white aristocracy, proudly conscious of having maintained its superiority notwithstanding arduous struggles. It was this sentiment of just pride which the British government well understood how to wound in its most sensitive part by favoring the natives as against the Afrikanders.

"Emissaries of the London Missionary Society slandered the Boers, and accused them of the most inhuman cruelties to the natives. But they emerged from the ordeal triumphantly, and the records of the criminal courts of the Cape Colony bear indisputable witness to the fact that there were no people among the slave-owning classes of the world more humane than the Boers. Their treatment of the natives was based on the theory that natives ought not to be considered as mature and fully developed people, but that they were in reality children who had to be won over to civilization by just and rigid discipline; they hold the same convictions on this subject today."

That the natives are "in reality children, who have to be won over to civilization by just and rigid discipline," is good Euphuism indeed for the hideous practice of making raids upon a weaker people for the purpose of procuring slaves. But we are told:

"A livelier sense of wrong was quickened by the way in which the emancipation of the slaves—in itself an excellent measure—was carried out in the case of the Boers."

In fact, after the Boers had been compelled to free their slaves, the British government voting twenty millions for compensation, they were not allowed to replace them. The indignity of manual labor was thus forced upon the "white aristocracy." Thereupon, it would seem, they pocketed the money, packed their wagons, and trekked northward into a land where slavery was not yet forbidden.

"Our forefathers had become owners of slaves, chiefly imported in English ships and sold to us by Englishmen. The British government decided to abolish slavery. . . . . Grayheads and widows who had lived in ease and comfort went down poverty-stricken to the grave, and gradually the hard fact was borne in upon us that there was no such thing as justice for us in England."

The records show that the freedmen were chiefly Kaffirs, Matabeles, Basutos and Hottentots by tribe—peoples that lived in territory contiguous to that occupied by the Boers. They were chiefly captured by the Boers themselves in their raids. When the English obtained possession of the Cape Colony by convention, the Fish river formed the eastern boundary. There were no Boers living beyond the Fish river. That was Kaffir territory, secured to the blacks in solemn convention. And this is the way Mr. Van der Hoogt describes a cruel act of aggression by the Boers, and its just censure by the British. He says:

"The governor was ultimately prevailed upon to free the strip of territory beyond the Fish river from the raids of the Kaffirs, and this was done by the aid of the Boers. But Lord Glenelg, the Colonial Secretary, reversed this policy and restored the whole territory to the natives. He maligned the Boers in even more forcible terms than the emissaries of the London Missionary Society, and openly favored the Kaffirs, placing them on a higher pedestal than the Boers."

Black men of course ought not to be allowed to "raid" their own territory, even though they hold it by solemn convention. Lord Glenelg did wrong to "malign" the Boers for punishing the Kaffirs. He even made them restore stolen property.

"The latter [the Boers] had succeeded in rescuing their cattle from the Kaffirs, but were forced to look on passively while the very same cattle, with the owner's brand marks plainly visible, were sold by public auction to defray the costs of the commando. The high-minded descendants of the proudest and most stubborn peoples of Europe had to bend the knee before a government which united a commercial policy of crying injustice with a veneer of simulated philanthropy."

Since they were not allowed to take and hold slaves, since they were not allowed even to "rescue" cattle from the Kaffirs, there was nothing for the Boers to do but get out. In the words of Piet Retief, when he left Grahamstown with his expedition:

"We complain of the severe losses which we have been forced to sustain by the emancipation of our slaves, and the vexatious laws which have been enacted respecting them. . . . We are now leaving the fruitful land of our birth, in which we have suffered enormous losses and continual vexation, and are about to enter a strange and dangerous territory; but we go with a firm reliance on the all-seeing, just and merciful God, whom we shall always fear and humbly endeavor to obey."

I doubt if Mr. Van der Hoogt and Mr. White will be able to enlist the services of the battleship Iowa upon any such arguments of oppression, even granting that slavery is a good thing for both Kaffir and Boer, and that John Bull was a brute for interfering; or upon any of the arguments, indeed. The Iowa has troubles of her own. The Story of the Boers is published by Harper & Bros., New York.

NEW BOOKS.

Mr. Hamilton Drummond, "who also was born in the Arcadia" of romance, is out with a tale of adventure entitled A Man of His Age, for the delectation of moderns. Mr. Drummond, I fear, has made a sad mistake to begin with. His hero is a married man, and although the reader will follow his fortunes with interest, the peculiar kind of interest that attaches to the true romance will of necessity be absent. Not that the love interest is the only or the highest interest. It is not. It is, however, the most popular interest, and oftentimes it gives a large degree of unity to a tale where otherwise unity would be lacking. In the book at hand the love interest would have given unity to plot and incident. It would have increased the charm of the narration. It might even have made the style more lucid and simple, to have had a beautiful lady heroine among the characters. For the style is not lucid and simple. Instead it is involved and labored in its attempt at quaintness.

Mr. Drummond seems to have felt this need for a lady heroine; for he has built up a sub-plot immediately under the main plot, and this sub-plot has a lady heroine. She is beautiful in face and figure, but a spy and a traitoress at heart; and although she yields her heart in the end without any reservation to the young man her lover, she will not win the sympathies of the young woman her author's reader by that one capitulation. For it is through her treacheries that the main hero is all but done to death on various occasions. The tale is placed during the boyhood of Henry the Great, King of Navarre. There is plenty of stirring incident and some good historical color. The action, however, comes to nothing except that the villain is killed off, after failing in his plots against Monsieur Blaise de Bernauld. Published by the Harpers.

Mr. Frederick Remington has made up a book of sketches and short stories out of his most private journal, and called it Men with the Bark On (Harper & Bros.) A few of the sketches are vastly good. On the whole the illustrations are as good as the letterpress. The stories are of the rough type of man that Mr. Remington is never tired of depicting: Indians, cowboys, gamblers, outlaws, soldiers. The better ones are those which deal with the late Spanish-American war, which their author attended in person. Simply told, these studies of men in camp and in action are very nearly the best short stories the war has produced. They are "convincing," as the magazine editors say. They ring true. Their characters breathe and eat. And they are pathetic, too, some of them. Pathos, however, is not an expensive condiment. Almost any writer can afford to use it these days. It is no longer a compliment to call a story pathetic. But it is a compliment to say that a tale is "convincing." Some of Mr. Remington's sketches are very slight, hardly worth preservation in book form; for instance, "The Bowels of a Battleship." Some of them are more than a little newspaperish and commonplace: the "Sorrows of Don Pidal," for in tance, being the tale of a Cuban reconcentrado. Some of them, like "The War Dreams," have absolutely no human interest, their symbolism being too thoroughly out of kind to be anything but a bore. Barring these, the book contains some eight thoroughly good stories.

WASHINGTON.
THE PRECEDENT BUGBEAR.

NEW YORK.
COSTUMES IN NEW PLAYS.

WASHINGTON.

IF YOU should ask a woman of Washington to tell you honestly what she considered the most important event of the present administration, she would not name the war, nor the new issue of expansion, nor the Hay-Paunecfote agreement, nor any of the things which strike the average citizen as important. No indeed; the stately dame of Washington would mention a question which never took up a half a column altogether i any Western newspaper, but which ha shaken Washington official circles to their depths—Precedence.

For in the social life of this alleged democracy, the question of precedence enters, as in the old and effete monarchies, only with a perplexing difference. There, they have a Lord Chamberlain or some corresponding functionary, who decides when doctors disagree. But here, although there are rules and customs, we have no one who can interpret them with authority. So that the innumerable little squabbles which have arisen in past time have been settled by informal arbitration or have remained unsettled. The history of all these teapot tempests reads very much the same. The wife of Senator This is seated higher at table than Mrs. Cabinet Minister That, and there is friction between the two ladies, which gradually draws in their husbands. It always starts with the women, you observe, because women form the section of creation which takes such matters seriously. But for them, there would be no society of any sort, official or smart; it is to them as politics to men. Hence the disturbance in the minds of the fair sex caused by the questions of precedence under the McKinley rule.

The chief disturbing cause was the death of Vice-President Hobart. As everybody knows, precedence in the higher walks of official life, follows the order established by the Succession Bill—President first, then Vice-President, then Secretary of State and so on. But—it is a long but—the functions of the vice-president were divided after his death. That is, Senator Frye took his place as President pro tem of the Senate, while Secretary of State Hay is the legal claimant for the Presidential chair in case McKinley dies. Now the question arises as to which is really authorized to stand next to the President. Senator Frye, urged doubtless by his wife, has been the more active in pressing his claims, but society in general has been disposed to grant the favor to Secretary Hay. This is simple enough, although perplexing. But Speaker Henderson of the House is mixed in the disturbance. Admitting that Secretary Hay stands next to the President, he claims social precedence over Senator Frye. His argument is as follows: The position accruing to a vice-president comes from the fact that he is to succeed the President. Very well. That function is performed by the Secretary of State. As president pro tem of the Senate, Frye is occupying only a temporary position and holds no right of precedent over the permanent speaker of the House. This is his line of reasoning, and he holds firmly to its conclusions not, he explains, on his own behalf, but for the greater honor and dignity of the House of Representatives.

Now, the three gentlemen involved in this delightful little mix-up are considerate enough to dodge one another whenever they can, and thus save their hosts trouble and embarassment. Secretary Hay's main social hold is tact, and he has managed beautifully. Speaker Henderson is less tactful, perhaps, but just as considerate. He has made it his business to enquire, before accepting any invitation, whether Senator Frye was expected to be present. In cases where the president of the Senate has already accepted, he has sent a courteous declination or has made it a condition that he should be granted precedence, "for the dignity of the House." And so there has been less friction than might be expected, but the end is not yet.

Quite different is the other celebrated case of this Administration, where Mrs. Dewey was granted precedence over the wives of the army dignitaries at the President's New Year reception. The President's reason for granting the favor was a desire to accomodate Mrs. Dewey, who had a reception of her own on hand, and was anxious to get away as soon as possible—so she said. But those who know Mrs. Dewey have their doubts about her sincerity in asking the favor on those grounds. This female king-maker, with her talent for intrigue, has always chafed under the established law of precedence which, by giving the Army first who never smelled powder in the Spanish war rights over the Navy, lets in over her distinguished husband several generals. Those who claim to know assert that her reason as given was only a ruse to spite her fancied enemies.

These are the domestic cases. Outside of these, there have been some awful blunders made in treating with the representatives of foreign powers. Secretary Root, who does not take kindly to official etiquette, has made the most monumental "break." He asked the members of the Foreign Embassies to a reception in honor of Sir Henry Irving. Now, in Europe, entertainments are given formally only in honor of royalties. A minister or ambassador in a foreign land represents, in official etiquette, the person of his sovereign. To ask him to do honor to a subject is to ask the same service of his royal master. Moreover, Sir Henry Irving is of the tribe of playactors, and caviare to courtly etiquette. To bid Sir Julian Pauncefote to a reception in honor of Irving is like inviting Queen Victoria "to meet Sarah Bernhardt." The Roots, new to courtly observances, were surprised and pained at receiving polite notes of regret from all the foreign delegations. The entertainment was a social success, as are all the functions of the Roots, who are mightily popular in Washington, but the ambassadors and ministers were conspicuous by their absence. Had the unlucky phrase been left out and had the presence of Sir Henry as guest of honor been tacitly understood, all would have been well. The McLeans made exactly the same mistake when they issued cards for a musicale "to meet Admiral and Mrs. Dewey." As in the case of the War Secretary's entertainment, foreign dignitaries, one and all, declined the honor.

These are only a few of the blunders which have hinged on the question of precedence this year. It remained for the White House to perpetrate the worst one. It was at the state dinner to the Diplomatic Corps. The secretary who arranged the seating of the guests sent in the Mexican Ambassador with the wife of the Austrian Minister. Now, all the world knows that Mexico and Austria have had no diplomatic relations since the execution of Maximilian, but this is not the worst. Senor Aspiroz, the Mexican Ambassador in question, is the advocate who prosecuted the Austrian prince before the fatal court-martial. Such a faux pas never occurred in any court of Europe; it will never again occur in Washington if the lecture given by McKinley to his unfortunate secretary be kept in official memory.

ROBT. LONG.

NEW YORK.

THERE has been nothing startlingly artistic about the plays of this theatrical season in New York—except for the gowns. Old plays and old plots, old situations, old repartee, have been dished up to us this year, even to weariness. But the dressing, ah, that is a different story. Never have stage costumes been so expensive and so elaborate. The latest sensation in this regard is furnished by the coat worn by Jessie Millward of the Empire Company in the second act of "A Man and His Wife." The whole play is well costumed but this one piece of dressmaking stands out above all others, the star of the piece.

It is a long cloak, with flowing lines, made entirely of this beautiful cloth of silver, lined with tucked pale blue chiffon with frills on either side under the edge, which show when the coat is thrown open. Appliqued on the coat is a beautiful pattern of real thread lace in an effective design of baskets of flowers and bow knots. It is like a lace overcoat, pointed long in the back and sloping up till it has a short jacket effect in the front. One of the basket designs of the lace, and they are about natural size, is in each of the front corners of the cloak, and a narrow pattern of the lace outlines the fronts and lower edge. There is a high collar and a clasp buckle of rhinestones, and a large scarf passes around the neck and hangs in long ends down the front. It is a beautiful garment.

The gray chiffon gown which is worn under the wrap is equally admirable. The skirt is fashioned of narrow hand-stitched tucks, and it fits the figure like a sheath down to below the knees, where it flares out with frilled edges. But the really beautiful part of this gown is the lace of real silver, soft and flexible, the genuine qualities making it a thing of permanent beauty. It is set in big medallions, a sort of de Medici design just above the flare of the skirt, on the lower edge of which, alternating with the little frills at the edge of the plaiting, are bands of the silver.

There is a bolero jacket effect of the silver on the low-cut bodice, the long sleeves reaching to the knuckles are of the same beautiful lace, set with sapphires on the flare at the wrist, and on the bodice, where they make a butterfly on the lace in front.

The first gown Miss Millward wears is one of those beautiful silk applique gowns on white net, made princesse, with considerable fullness at the top of the skirt in the back, according to the late models from abroad. It opens down the side of the front with big paste or rhinestone buttons, and there is a handsome buckle to match at the waist line in the back. This is a handsome afternoon or dinner gown, cut low at the throat, with a little full falling collar of the chiffon, and below the sleeves of the applique, which reach just below the elbow undersleeves of the chiffon.

In "The Bugle Call," run as a curtain-raiser to "A Man and His Wife," Margaret Anglin wears a gown which attracts less attention than the more startling coat of Miss Millward, but which is just as meritorious from an artistic standpoint. It is a petunia velvet, or one can call it a soft rose with purple shades, if that sounds more attractive. It has a Cluny lace vest and undersleeves, Eton jacket, and a muff, boa, and hat to match. And there are new points in this gown, though masculine eyes may fail to note them or its other merits. Just notice the fullness in the skirt of the little frock. Three box plaits on either side at the waist line and more in the back set out, side in regular box plait fashion to make bulk, and the fullness flowing out below them. That is the kind of skirt that is to be seen in late Paris models. The Eton jacket is simple opening wide in front to show the lace vest and transparent stock. There is a little turnback collar, and the sleeves which reach just below the elbow have pretty little turned back cuffs, while from the edge of the sleeve, reaching well down over the hand, its the under sleeve of the Cluny lace to match the vest, one of those fashions of the sixties which are creeping in by degrees and with more and more assurance.

The only trimming on the jacket bodice is a narrow band of dull silver galloon which out, lines its edges and those of the collar, cuffs and around the armhole. The vest is made almost entirely of it. It is a pretty belt. The two rows of the galloon which trim it are set so close together in front that they practically form the belt, but they widen slightly as they pass around the waist until in the back the upper row shapes up into a little point which harmonizes in line with the lower edge of the little jacket some distance above it, which is cut up in a point.

The hat, boa, and muff are made of flowers-double hollyhocks, perhaps, just the shade of the gown and of the velvet. The low centre of the hat, which is worn down over the face, is a mass of these flowers with velvet at the sides and back. The body of the muff is another mass of flowers, and is made light and effective, with narrow folds of the velve which set out on either side.

The boa is the most charming bit of it all. It, too, is made of the flowers, the part which passes around the neck, while the long ends, which hang almost to the lower edges of the skirt, are made of numbers of strands of these narrow velvet folds, caught near the end with more of the flowers. It is exceedingly stylish and pretty, one of the prettiest things that has been seen on the stage this winter.

AT THE THEATERS

For its second production, the Neill Company presents a play even weaker than its initial production. "Captain Letterblair" is a poor, invertebrate sort of piece. It was written for a newspaper prize, and was snapped up by Sothern because the fat leading part was very well suited to his capabilities. Without Sothern, it is of even less worth than is "A Bachelor's Romance" without Sol Smith Russel. The plot is fairly original, it is true; one situation—that of the heroine caught by the skirt in a closed door and in a place where she would rather not be—made a mild sensation when the piece first appeared and served well for advertising purposes. But in the main it is mushy and correspondingly dull. Miss Merrington fails, as all women writers seem to fail, in the attempt to depict a male villain. The one in this particular play is unnatural beyond the bounds of sense; his villainy shows mainly in throwing covert sneers and open insults at the hero. The leading character is fairly drawn, but the part is a peculiar one—a Sothern part through and through, although it was not written to him. It needs Sothern's romantic charm to carry it.

Strong actors need strong plays, and it is therefore unfair again to pass judgment on the Neill people. Mr. Neill himself acted with feeling and some spirit, but the laurels go to Edythe Chapman. In her small part in "A Bachelor's Romance," she proved that she is an actress with the high gift of ease and naturalness; in this production, she has a chance at a part which calls for both pathos and humous appreciation, and carries it off admirably.

It is a question if the quiet method which I felt called upon to commend in last week's performance is not carried too far in "Captain Letterblair." The performance dragged in places where more life and vim would have carried it through with a rush. Next week, the company has a better chance in a really good play—"A Gilded Fool."

The Fulgora all star specialty company makes part of the bill at the Orpheum next week. At its head is "Little Fred" and his troupe of aquatic and equestrian animals. The Sidmans have a sketch entitled 'Back Home." Bowman and Ardell are sketch artists with singing and dancing specialties. The Brothers Forrest are clowns with a novel act. Etta Butler, a San Francisco girl, is a bright, particular attraction on the bill. She has had great success abroad as a mimic.

Ward and Vokes in the musical farce "The Floor Walkers" are to continue at the Columbia Theatre for another week presenting some new features in song and dance for the last nights of the engagement. Lucy Daly, Margaret Daly Vokes, The Chicago Ladies' Quartette and Will West are among the hits of the cast. Yale's spectacle production, "The Evil Eye" follows on Monday May 7th.

IN DARKEST AFRICA.

1. "Not much appetite in this climate."

2. "Good gracious! Snakes!!"

3. "I'm off!!!"

4. The other end of the tale.

The Neill company presents Henry Guy Carleton's comedy "A Gilded Fool," next week. This is the play in which Nat Goodwin first made his reputation, and is well suited to the abilities of the company. There will be matinees Thursday and Saturday.

John Drew's engagement at the Columbia Theatre next month is to be positively limited to six nights and one matinee. He plays "The Tyranny of Tears" and brings with him the original cast.

George Marion, an old San Franciscan, for years one of Charles Hoyt's right hand men, will stage manage all of the farce comedies during the summer season at the California Theatre.

The Alcazar finished its run of "Quo Vadis," this week. Bret Harte's romantic comedy, "Sue," opens on Sunday night.

"Club Cocktails"

Sent Home To-day.

You will then have on your own sideboard a better cocktail than can be served over any bar in the world. A cocktail is substantially a blend of different liquors, and all blends improve with age.

The "Club Cocktails" are made of the best of liquors; made by actual weight and measurement. No guesswork about them.

Ask your husband at breakfast which he prefers—a Manhattan, Martini, Whiskey, Holland Gin, Tom Gin, Vermouth or York—and then surprise him with one at his dinner.

CONVENTIONALITIES AT THE FRONT.—During one of the minor skirmishes before Cronje surrendered, a certain aristocratic Colonel in command of a detatchment of cavalry observed that his guns were in danger. He requested one of his aides to go to Captain A's assistance. "Pardon," he added, as the officer turned to obey. "Perhaps, Mr. B., you do not know A.?" Mr. B. had not the pleasure. "I'll introduce you, then. Charming fellow A.!" said his lordship; and, regardless of bursting shells and puffs of dirt which marked the pitch of bullets all round them, he cantered along the hillside with Mr. B. "Captain A., let me introduce Mr. B.! Captain A., B. will lend you a hand to bring in that gun. Hope neither of you will be knocked over doing it!" The ceremony of introduction, punctuated by shot and shell, performed, his lordship cantered quietly back to his post of observation.

NOT TOO OLD FOR THE SENATE.—Down in Alabama Pettus was a leading Democratic politician with no aspirations beyond the honor of presiding over a State convention. He helped everybody and asked nothing for himself. He had, however, been a State Judge, and thought he would like to end his days on the Federal bench. There was a vacancy, and he came to Washington to see Senator Pugh. This was during Cleveland's last administration. Senator Pugh looked over Pettus's application and hesitated about signing it. "The President," he said, "wants young men on the bench. You are too old." "I am not too old to be a senator," answered Pettus, and, returning to Alabama, he announced his candidacy. The contest was one-sided. Before Pugh knew what had happened, Pettus had secured the pledge of all the Legislature.

SHAKESPEARE'S BEST CHARACTERISTIC.—A man of letters who visited Washington recently appeared at but one dinner party during his stay. Then he sat next to the daughter of a noted naval officer. Her vocabulary was of a kind peculiar to extremely young girls, but she rattled away at the famous man without a moment's respite. It was during the pause in the general conversation that she said to him: "I'm awfully stuck on Shakespeare. Don't you think he's terribly interesting?" Everybody listened to hear the great man's reply, for as a Shakespearian scholar he has few peers. "Yes," he said, solemnly, "I do think he is interesting. I think he is more than that. I think Shakespeare is just simply too cute for anything."

x

INDIAN SARCASM.—An Indian agent who was a militia Colonel, desired to impress the Indians with the magnitude of his dignity. He dressed himself in full uniform, with his sword by his side, and rising in his council told them that one reason why the Great Father had had so much trouble with his red children was that he had sent the civilians to them. "You are warriors," he said, "and when the Great Father saw me he said: 'I will send this man, who is a great warrior, to my red children, who are warriors, and they will hear his words.'" An old chief arose, and, surveying the speaker from head to foot, said calmly: "Since I was a small boy I have heard that white men have great warriors. I have always wanted to see one. I have looked upon one, and now I am ready to die."

x

THE WAY OUT.—The leading man of a melodramatic company touring in the provinces fell ill in a minor Scotch town. The hero role had to be taken by his understudy, who was talented, but slender. At the crisis of the play, the princess—who happened on this occasion to be not less substantial than lovely—faints and falls, and the hero's task is to lift her up and carry her from the stage. The understudy, realizing the difficulty of the task before him, hesitated perceptibly. Then there was a hush, broken at last by a thin voice from the gallery, "just tak' what ye can, mon, and come back for the rest!"

x

SUSPENSE AND SUSPENSION.—An eminent vegetarian doctor once wrote to the judges of London, England, asking if it were not time that, by way of experiment, capital punishment should be suspended. He received only one answer, which was to this effect—"Dear Sir—I consider it preferable that the murderer should be suspended." The vegetarian replied—"May your lordship never know what an awful thing suspense is!"

x

DESECRATING THE SABBATH.—The Duchess of Bucleuch had an old Presbyterian nurse, who was once persuaded to attend the beautiful church they had built. The Duchess afterward asked her if it was not very beautiful, and she said: "Oh, yes, very." "And the singing, said the Duchess, "was not that lovely?" "Yes, your Grace," she said. "It was lovely; but it's an awful way of spending the Sabbath."

EVENTS CURRENT.

The Transvaal War. Still Lord Roberts lingers in the Orange Free State, delaying his anxiously expected advance into the Transvaal, and still the British public chafes under the delay. In London, the feeling has grown to be one of impatience, a faint echo of the popular sentiment during the days when Buller was pounding toward Ladysmith and Methuen's beaten force was idly facing the Boers on the wrong side of Modder river. Only one anxiety has been removed; the chances of intervention now seem very faint. The Boer efforts with America were wisely checked; Germany, where the government has favored England and the people have rabidly opposed her, is cooling off; the expressions of the official and semi-official press have become quite moderate. Even France has ceased carping at the English and applauding the Boers, the energies of the Parisian press being now occupied with the Exposition. Russia is stolidly silent. Under these circumstances, the English feel that they have now only the one foe to contend with. At the front, all is comparatively quiet. When this record closed last week, Roberts had just succeeded in raising the siege of Wepener and was spreading a net to catch the Boer force in its retreat. This attempt proved futile; the rapidly-moving Boers outfooted the British cavalry and mounted infantry and got away into Transvaal. They took with them the heavily-loaded supply trains which they had been filling during the Wepener engagements. In a way, this was a victory for the Boers and their able commander, Botha, who gained two of the objects for which the Boers are now fighting. First, he delayed Roberts' advance, thus giving the main Boer army its opportunity of perfecting its defenses within the Transvaal, and secondly, he got away with great quantities of supplies for use in that uncertain future time when Pretoria is besieged. There are not wanting signs that the Burghers have gained the objects which they sought in the late desultory invasion of the Free State, and that they will now fall back upon their own soil and wait for the winter campaign. The forces retreating from Wepener, and from other stations where they have faced the British, told the natives that "Kruger had called them home." Although their supply trains were full, these troops were ragged, tired and discouraged from their month of hard marching and fighting, and many deserted on the way. In the region where the late fighting occurred, there is only one strong Boer force, and that at Thabanchu, a difficult position to attack. A conflict is near at hand at this point. Of late, there has been a mysterious movement of Boer troops west of Bloemfontein and between Fourteen Streams and Kimberley. It is too early to hazard even a guess as to the meaning of this.

Two Great Catastrophies. During the past week there have been two great catastrophies, attended with loss of property and life, in North America. There was a big colliery disaster in Utah on May 1, and a great fire visited Hull and Ottawa, Canada, on April 27. The mining catastrophe occurred at the town of Scofield, Utah, a coal camp about 100 miles south of Salt Lake City. Mine No. 4, used as a powder magazine, exploded, killing every man who was in that and the adjoining mine No. 1, at the time. As there are no survivors, the cause is not known. The loss of life is at least 250; there is practically no list of injured, as the explosion did its work with terrible certainty, suffocating the men in No. 1 mine and mangling those in No. 4. Although the relief corps has rescued not more than two-thirds of the bodies of those known to have been in the shafts when the explosion occurred, there is absolutely no hope for the others. Whoever remained alive after the first shock must have died from a fire of coal-dust which swept the shaft immediately afterward. The fire in Canada started in the town of Hull, a manufacturing suburb of Ottawa, and wiped out that town, which is the site of many valuable lumber yards. It then swept on to Ottawa, driven before a high wind. It ran over a large part of the residence district and at one time threatened the business portion of the city and the Government buildings, but a fortunate shift in the wind saved this section. Over five square miles of territory burned over, 2,000 buildings destroyed, 7,000 persons rendered homeless, eight persons killed and $17,000,000 worth of property destroyed is the record of this fire. Besides this, many thousands are put out of work by the wholesale destruction of the largest factories in Canada. A dirty chimney caused all the trouble. Subscriptions to aid the sufferers are being taken throughout Canada and the East.

The Canal Bill Before the House. The Nicaragua Canal matter has been before the people and Congress of the United States for over fifty years, and now for the first time it has come up for a vote in our national assembly. On May 1st, the general bill was put before the House of Representatives for a vote. By the time this paper is in the hands of its readers, the result will be known. As it stands now, the measure occupies an anomalous position. A great majority of the House are firm believers in the canal, yet so many small groups are against the measure in its present form, for a variety of widely-differing reasons, that the chances of immediate passage are looked upon as doubtful. The debate on May 1st developed powerful opposition. One element, headed by Burton of Ohio, opposed the bill because they believed that action should be delayed until the commission appointed to survey the route should be ready to report and until the Hay–Pauncefote tangle should be cleared away. Still another faction, this one strongly Democratic, takes exception to the omission of a clause giving the United States the right to fortify the waterway and its harbors. The absence of a definite agreement with Nicaragua proved another barrier. Meanwhile, one obstacle has fallen away. The Maritime Canal Company, which has held a concession from the Nicaraguan government for the private construction of a canal, has lost its right. The original concession was to have expired on October 5th, last; the company applied for an extension, was refused, and appealed to arbitration. The Nicaraguan government was ready to arbitrate, but the company refused the government terms regarding a tribunal, and the concession was cancelled.

The Turkish Damage Case. Turkey has not made settlement of the American claims, and is delaying the negotiations with the characteristic procrastination which marks Oriental diplomacy. Since the delivery of the last note Turkey has been pressing this government to agree to an arrangement by which the demand may be satisfied under cover of a payment to an American shipbuilding concern for the construction of a war ship of the Turkish navy. It is now known to Turkey that the United States will not agree to any such arrangement, and the officials, therefore, expect that the Turkish answer will propose some new form of indirect satisfaction of the American claim. The government appears to accept no settlement of a roundabout character. That the administration means business there can be no doubt, but its most radical action will not, it is said, be extended further than the severance of diplomatic relations with the Porte. Certainly that is the only course now under consideration as the first step. Whether there will be any second step will depend on circumstances. The President and his official advisers are apparently opposed to going any further than that. Curiously enough, nearly all the urging about sending a fleet has come from ministers of the gospel who are interested in missionary work in Armenia. There is an undercurrent of feeling in administration circles that the offer of a naval construction contract and the permission given for reconstruction of the destroyed college at Harput ought to be considered in arranging terms of settlement.

The Senate Refuses to Seat Quay. By a majority of one vote, the Senate has refused to give a seat to Matthew Quay of Pennsylvania, Senator by appointment of Governor Stone of that state. This case has dragged along for months, first in the Legislature of Pennsylvania and then in Congress. The question hinged largely on a constitutional point. It is provided that the Governor of a state may appoint a Senator "in case vacancies occur by resignation or otherwise during the recess of the Legislature." Quay's former term expired while the Legislature of Pennsylvania was in session, and he became a candidate to succeed himself. There was a long and bitter fight over the candidacy, ending in a deadlock, and the body adjourned without naming a Senator. Thereupon, the Governor, believing that he stood on his rights under the Constitution, appointed Quay to the vacancy. It now appears that he had not this right. There is no better hated man in some elements of Pennsylvania politics than this same Quay, and his enemies brought their fight into the Senate. It has been fought all the year in caucus, committee and session, and ends only now, a month before adjournment. The democratic papers do not hesitate to declare that the whole affair was a "put up job." Guided by precedent, they say, the Senate could not have seated the Pennsylvania man; the Republicans therefore agreed in caucus to vote in such manner that he should lose by only one vote. Thus, while maintaining the consistency of the body, they gave him a practical endorsement which he will use when he comes up again as a candidate at the next session of the Pennsylvania Legislature. Incidentally, this shows what would have happened had the Governor appointed a Senator after the deadlock in the last regular session of the California Legislature.

Ominous Signs in China. Recent events in China go to prove that a crisis in the reign of the Dowager Empress is close at hand. According to latest telegrams, the European warships along the coast are showing signs of activity and are already landing marines. The reason given for this act is the protection of European lives in the insurrection now close at hand, but the real reason is, almost without doubt, a general intention to overthrow the reigning dynasty in the interest of progress or at least to check its reactionary policy. The powers have grown tired of this woman's machinations and of the unrest and danger which they have caused. The incipient rebellion which threatens the Empire is widespread. Even the Hunanese troops, the main reliance of the Tartar dynasty, are becoming mutinous and may rise at any time. In the whole change of Imperial policy, the Anglo-Saxons in China see the hand of Russia. It is predicted that when the storm breaks, the Czar will stand with the Chinese against England, Japan and the United States, with France as an indeterminate factor. In late issues of the China Gazette, the Anglo-Saxon mouthpiece in China, this attitude is taken. That paper summarizes the situation as follows:—"If the present policy of the Empress Dowager, inspired by her evil advisers, Kang Yi, Prince Ching, Li Hung Chang and Hsuitong on the one hand and by the Russian and other continental political wire-pullers on the other is not speedily restrained, an era of widespread horror and bloodshed is not far off. The people, and even many of the mandarins, most certainly those in the middle and southern provinces, are ready to rise and throw off the strangling yoke that binds them. No one who knows anything of the history of China since this bloodstained, ambitious and wholly selfish woman seized the reins of power upon the death of the Emperor Hien Fung, can wonder at the growth of sullen hatred for her name and rule, while the countless defeats and humiliations that China has since undergone have convinced the popular mind that the Empress Dowager is accursed by perpetual ill luck, for all the misfortunes that have happened since the present unfortunate nominal Emperer was selected have really occurred while the Empress Dowager exercised uncontrolled power."

The Cuban Currency. One of the present needs of the Island of Cuba is a stable banking system and a paper currency of some sort. Under the Foraker resolution, nothing like a national banking system is possible at the present time, and the Island is held down to a most confused and ridiculous plan of finance. In this system, the various large business houses assume the functions of banks. They go even further; most of them are mixed in the business of their customers to such a degree that it savors of paternalism. They lend money on time, accepting notes, growing crops and chattels as security; buy and sell for their customers, take care of their surplus funds; pay interest on deposits and have a paper currency of their own. These firms are heavy operators and do an enormous business, but they are often embarrassed through these transactions reaching the limit of their carrying capacity. They will hold notes amounting to hundreds of thousands of dollars and possess warehouses crowded to their full capacity with crops or goods held as securities and yet be on the verge of bankruptcy through lack of ready money. Their varying currency has produced a chaotic condition of affairs. Their is no standard at all. The money in common use is a mixture of French, German, English, Spanish and American coin, each with its fluctuating rate of exchange. The factor controlling rates is not only the normal fluctuation of exchange but the will of the banker, who manipulates the rates as he wishes. A firm money system would work wonders in Cuban trade. This is not procurable today, and will not be until there is a stable government of some sort. The other disagreeable features of the present banking system have been in some measure relieved by the establishment of branch offices by several American trust companies. Once a real currency is established, there will be an immense fields for banks.

Boer Resolutions Lost in the Senate. The resolution of sympathy for the Boers, which went through the House of Representatives by an overwhelming vote, was beaten in the conservative Senate. Nevertheless, the majority of nine votes was so small that it proves an overwhelming degree of sympathy in Congress for the Boer cause. This must be frankly admitted. The passage of such a measure would have been an open and direct insult to England, and that within two years of England's firm stand for this country in our war with Spain. It would doubtless have involved us in serious entanglements, it would have retarded the adjustment of the Hay–Pauncefote affair, and it would have imperilled our chances of obtaining a favorable conclusion to the Alaskan boundary disputes. There were, then, grave considerations of policy against such a measure; the scant majority proves that, had had these not existed, Congress would have passed the resolutions. It is fortunate for the Republican party that it did not do so, because, in that event, President McKinley would have been under the necessity of exercising the veto power, and the opponents of the administration would have been furnished with an open act upon which to hang their "play" for the great mass of Boer sympathizers throughout the country.

The Opening of Corea. The friction between Russia and China over trade privileges in Corea calls attention to the possibilities of European exploitation in that country. Corea is the decadent of the East. Her first appearance in history is as a battle-ground between the Chinese and the Japanese. Since then, she has continually been a tributary nation to the one or the other. Less stubborn than the Chinese and with none of the Japanese brains, dash and energy, the Coreans remained, through their very apathy, an unknown hermit kingdom long after China was fairly open. Thirty years ago, missionaries were publicly roasted to death in Seoul by order of the Emperor. Twenty years ago, Europeans were first admitted. Now, the natives are ready to receive the whites with their customary apathetic indifference. Their very nerveless degeneracy prevents them from making active opposition. This being true, the field for exploitation consists in opening up the resources of the country through European capital and enterprise rather than in the spread of European commerce. It is doubtful if the people will ever raise their standard of living sufficiently to make general demands for European manufactured goods. The chance for Europeans lies in the exploitation of huge tracts of fertile but fallow land. Corea is not overcrowded like China and Japan; her agricultural land has only been dipped into here and there; her forests lie uncut, her deposits of coal and metal are unopened. Part of this is due to the Corean national character and a part to the state of subjugation in which she has existed since the days of Ku la Kahn, and which has killed every form of enterprise. An electric railway is working now in the streets of Seuol, and, although wrecked once by the mob, it has yet become a permanent thing and is used daily by the natives. Their comparatively ready acceptance of this novelty proves that they will endure further innovations when the time comes.

The Philippine War. One of the hottest fights, one of the most heroic stands of the whole Philippine war was that made last week by a detachment of the Forty-Third Infantry at Catubig, Island of Samur. The Americans were quartered in the town church when they were surrounded and besieged by several hundred insurgents. For two days they held the position. Then, the church caught fire and burned down. They held their own in the open until the fire was over, and then went back to the ruins and held them for three days longer. At the end of that time, the survivors were rescued by their own regiment, which had made a forced march to the relief. Of the original thirty, only ten remained alive. They had killed two hundred insurgents in the five days' fighting. Throughout Subig the insurgents are showing great activity and are keeping up an aggressive guerilla warfare. A belief is growing in Luzon that Aguinaldo is dead, killed by the savage Iggorates during the retreat of last winter. There is no proof that he has been alive since the Twenty-Third Infantry gave up the pursuit in the Benquet mountains. It is said by deserters that the insurgent general, Tinio, holds to this belief. Tinio had regular communication with the native leader until January, when the letters suddenly ceased, and he has received no further word. Neither, it is said, has his wife, now a captive in Manila, received any tidings. When last seen, Aguinaldo had only four men with him; he would therefore, have been easy prey for the savages. General Otis, interviewed just before leaving for the United States, took a different view. He believes that Aguinaldo is hiding in Isabella province with a force of 400 men. Furthermore, the General unburdened himself, in the same interview, of some more "Situation-well-in-hand" theories. "I have held the opinion for a time that the thing is entirely over. I cannot see where it is possible for the guerrillas to effect any reorganization, concentrate in any force or accomplish anything serious. Everywhere the people are giving valuable information and are almost daily disclosing hidden arms and other insurgent property. Filipinos who want peace are beginning to appreciate the power of the Americans to protect them, and are giving effective co-operation. The remnants of guerrilla bands are thoroughly scattered and they are unable to remain for any time in any place. Even the insurgent leaders recognize the necessity of the Americans staying here. They admit that a strong government is essential to the peace and prosperity of the islands. I asked Senor Mabini, Aguinaldo's Minister of Foreign Affairs, only the other day if he did not know that the United States were necessary to the Philippines. He replied that he did. I then asked him what the insurgents were fighting for, and he answered their object was to get the best terms. Even the best of them have thus been deluded into believing that they could wrest conditions from us."

Bryan the Bore.

MR. BRYAN has found another peg upon which he can hang hopes of a block of votes, and you may rest assured that it will not suffer from lack of exploiting. He has already established a happy and useful combination with Aguinaldo, and has painted this subject in all the hues and tones of anti-imperialism to secure the anti-administration votes. Now he has discovered another "pocket" that promises well. He announces that the hope of the Boers depends upon the defeat of McKinley. He picks up the South African war and injects the whole of it into American politics. Seriously, it is not at all impossible the Oom Paul and the Aguinaldo will contribute to Mr. Bryans election. He has exhibited a complete willingness to use this government to serve their interests, if but given the power. Oom Paul particularly is equipped with large and ready means. If by the expenditure of a few million dollars in American politics, he could upset a conservative Republican administration and put in a Democratic president who would lean his way, he could well afford to venture the investment. Kruger and his government have much to lose, and as Mr. Bryan aptly puts it, "the good offices of this nation can be tendered, according to the terms of the new Hague treaty, at the proper time and in earnest. These offices of friendly service would have great influence."

The Examiner's headlines announcing Mr. Bryan's intention read: "Bryan, if elected, would aid the Boers." So perhaps Mr. Bryan has gone further and agreed to awaken a war spirit that would favor forcible intervention.

To justify himself, in the eyes of his party for this stand, Mr. Bryan, after an interview with the chairman of the executive committee of the Democratic national body, makes the following announcement, which ought to reassure doubting Democrats in the belief that Bryan knows his business, and is not missing any device for attracting unfixed votes. He says:

"During my recent Western trip, in fact wherever I have been, I find the sentiment overwhelmingly in favor of the Boers. Any statement that the natural sympathy of this country is for the British, is a perversion of the facts that cannot mislead observers, but whose sole effect may be the delusion of England in a way that is likely to end in an unpleasant awakening to the truth." Here, then, is the ample political justification for his attitude. There are votes in it.

One must confess that the feeling here is mixed. But, where there is bitterness toward the course of England it may usually be traced to hereditary hate, or to European complications that find reflection here. Among Americans whose ancestors have lived here long enough to have eradicated all bitterness against or attachment for the older countries there lives a desire to see the war end. At first among such citizens there lived a feeling that England was in the wrong. Gradually, there has come out of it the knowledge that the government of Oom Paul, which is merely a republic in name, had with persistent and insistent narrowness visited all character of disabilities and inconveniences upon British subjects residing within her borders. If some fifty thousand Americans should go down into the Republic of Mexico, settle there and proceed to develop the mines and general resources of the country, and if the government of Mexico should visit the same character of disabilities and indignities upon these men of our own blood, there would go up from America such a cry of protest as would assuredly culminate in war, unless the Mexican government desisted. We went to war with Spain, because she abused her own subjects in the Island of Cuba and if that war was predicated upon justice and right, if we were justified by any rule of humanity in compelling Spain to treat her own subjects humanely, and then as the result of the war stripped her of her western and far eastern island possessions, then England is performing a much more natural duty in protecting her own subjects, and is equally justified in taking and holding the territory of the enemy. The feeling among Americans as we know them, is one of sorrow and sympathy for the thousands who are battling upon both sides. The long lists of killed and wounded British bring to the American no sense of elation, no pleasure. It may cheer the heart of some bitter antagonist who is American only by adoption. The gallant stand of Cronje challenged the admiration of not only Americans but of the world. England herself did not withhold expressions of admiration for the dogged courage of her adversaries. When Mr. Bryan assumes that the people of America, the people who are worthy of consideration from the point of numbers and intelligence, would approve or countenance any interference on the part of this government, in the British-Boer war, he is sadly mistaken. There is a body of voters who are today naturally upon the side of Bryan, who are also naturally Boer sympathizers. He will not make a vote by his advocacy of interference, though he may solidify certain elements among his followers.

The Bryan scheme is not difficult of understanding, and we are willing to prophesy that before many days have passed he will inquire into the matter of Turkish indemnity. If he finds that a large body of church-going people are deeply interested in the collection of this money claimed to be due from the Sultan, and if he discovers that political capital can be made by so doing, he will inaugurate a new line of abuse to visit upon the administration for what he will term its tardiness. He will promise in loud tones and large words to dispatch a fleet to demand prompt and full payment at the cannon's mouth.

Whatever the administration may do, you may rest assured it will not meet with Mr. Bryan's approval. If the president forces the issue, you will find William Jennings making a new alliance to accompany the Bryan-Aguinaldo—Bryan-Oom Paul combination. Mr. Bryan is a plain, everyday fakir, and his defeat at the next election will, we trust, bury him beyond any hope of future resurrection.

A Wise Man From Japan.

PROGRESSIVE Japan is ever willing to learn, all ways ready to advance, always ready to venture. Her statesmen and her soldiers, may be found in the nethermost portions of the globe if investigation there promises additions to their store of knowledge. Watchful, shrewd, attentive, they are drawing from the world's experience the best that offers, and are turning it to advantage at home. Kaha Otani, president of the Yokohama Chamber of Commerce, president of the Central Board of the Tea Traders Guild, and a member of the Japanese High Council for Agriculture, Commerce and Industry, recently passed through San Francisco, on his way home to Japan, after an extended tour of investigation through Europe and America. "Commercial conditions" were the subject of Mr. Otani's investigations. Of San Francisco, he very wisely said:

"At San Francisco my mission in foreign lands comes practically to an end. Here is the natural American gateway of the commerce of the Orient, and it is patent to me that a commerce of great magnitude with the countries o the East cannot fail to be realized here if the merchant classes of this West Coast metropolis of the United States avail themselves of the opportunities now presented.

This statement is in line with what this journal has declared for several years. The italics in the above quotation are our own. The first sentence italicized is an argument against the construction of the Nicaragua Canal. The wise man of Japan says.

"Here (San Francisco) is the natural American gateway of the commerce of the Orient." Columbus, Balboa and unnumbered Spanish navigators cruised unknown seas to discover the shortest route by which the merchantmen of Europe might tap the rich trade of the Orient. The world now acknowledges that this route lies across the Pacific to San Francisco Bay, or to Seattle on Puget Sound, and from thence across the American continent by rail, and yet both of these ports, with rare advantages, advocate the construction of an artificial and competitive gateway across Nicaragua.

The closing sentence of this Oriental investigator is equally significant and applies to both San Francisco and Seattle. He says:

"It is patent to me that a commerce of great magnitude with the countries of the East cannot fail to be realized, if the merchant classes of this West Coast metropolis of the United States avail themselves of the opportunities now presented."

What is true of the Oriental trade, is likewise true of South American trade, it is true of Australian and other island trade.

How many merchants in San Francisco receive and read the United States Consular Reports? They are issued monthly by the government, and scarcely a number is published that does not contain articles of interest to the man in search of foreign trade. Consul after consul has pointed out the trade possibilities in the Orient for the "merchant classes" of this Western Coast. The reports may be had gratis by writing to your Senator or Congressman, and to the merchant should be more entertaining and useful than any magazine published by private enterprise.

Quay's Case.

ELIMINATING altogether the question of Matthew Quay's personality, it is a matter for congratulation that the Senate refused to seat him on the appointment of Governor Stone. The determination of the case ought to, but will not, definitely settle the question involved. It will constitute another precedent, but the vote was so close that the refusal of the Senate to seat him almost loses its force and effect as precedent.

It frequently happens in state legislatures that the party in power will exercise control only by a margin of a few votes. When such a condition arises, it is possible for a governor through political influence, patronage and the like, to induce one or two or even a half dozen legislative members to refuse to enter a party caucus, to refuse to vote with the majority of their colleagues and so defeat the election of any senator during the regular session. It has often happened, in California and elsewhere, that the control of one vote might defeat the election of a senator. If Mr. Quay's right to a seat had gone unquestioned, had he been seated the door would have been opened to fraudulent practices such as those above outlined, for they would be fraudulent in as much as they from personal interest would defeat the clear wish of the majority.

In the matter of Senator Quay, we only know of him by hearsay. He is reported as a "good fellow" and the vote he secured in the United Senate proves this. Mr. Quay was certainly the choice of a large majority of the Legislature of his state, and in the natural order of things would have been duly chosen for the place had not John Wanamaker, with unlimited means at his command, inaugurated a crusade to secure his defeat. It is possible that the coming campaign will return a Legislature that will favor Mr. Quay, but Wanamaker promises to give the gentleman as lively a fight as money can buy.

IN Berlin there has recently been opened an Oriental commercial museum for the double purpose of establishing a permanent exposition of samples on the plan of the proposed San Francisco commercial museum, and of acting as a chamber of commerce to facilitate and increase the trade between Germany and the Orient. The German trader, through its instrumentality, may study the agricultural and industrial productions of the far East and will have, besides, access to a library and reading room containing literature instructive on the subject of this trade.

Both Germany and France have sent commissions to the Orient to investigate and make full report upon the commercial and industrial conditions of China and Japan. Recently in the House of Representatives the Democrats who had a majority present on the floor, succeeded in striking out the enacting clause to a bill that provided for the appointment of an American commission to make a similar investigation. So soon as a quorum is obtained, it is probable, the Republican members will succeed in restoring the enacting clause, and authorize the appointment of the commission.

By BOSWELL Jr.

Back Rooms and Blue Laws.

ONE who takes a stand which can in any way be interpreted as friendly to what is known as the "liquor power" is in great danger of criticism from the mass of well-meaning people who regard the saloon and the liquor traffic and all that thereunto pertains as something naturally and necessarily linked with crime. And so Supervisor Hotaling, in bucking up against the police authorities on the question of "boxes" in saloons, restaurants and cafés, has come in for the condemnation of this whole class. The law on the subject is plain, and is against Mr. Hotaling, if the law alone is to be considered. But anyone in the least familiar with the ways of municipalities knows that there are very, very few laws regarding the regulation of vice which are enforced or can be enforced. Almost all such statutes are placed on the books with the understanding that they shall be enforced when, in the judgment of the administrative body—the police—enforcement becomes necessary for the preservation of public decency. Vice is a persistent thing; squeezed in one direction, it grows in another; driven out from its own particular haunts, it disseminates itself through the whole body politic. The most enlightened municipal reformers know that the way to combat any form of vice is not to suppress it, to shut it up by law, but to herd its devotees by themselves, to enforce a moral quarantine. It is with this end in view that the city laws regarding misdemeanors are, and should be, administered with judicious laxity. Mr. Hotaling has mentioned profanity as an example. This is probably the best case in point, but there are many others. The city law forbids trade in the social evil, but he would be a rash chief of police who would attempt to enforce it. It forbids drunkenness, yet no police judge would think of fining and convicting every "drunk" found by the police. And the law against private rooms in places where liquor is sold should have a similar application. Where it is plain to the police that the place is being used for vicious purposes and with vicious intent, the law should be applied, but where the intent is proved to be innocent, common sense ought to step in and prevent its closing.

The law as it stands was passed because a murder occurred in some such place, as murders have occurred in saloons, and dives, and drawing-rooms, and hotels, and churches. But there was sense in it. No one doubts that the "box" in restaurants and saloons of certain classes is a prolific source of vice. There is no need of going into particulars. It is not a pleasant subject. But the law as written applies to the bars in hotels, forbidding them to serve drinks to the guests in their rooms by passages within the building, and it absolutely shuts off all use of private dining-rooms in public establishments. Yet the police are committed to a strict enforcement of the law, and must go to even this length. Further, these private dining-rooms are a great convenience to people who patronize restaurants, and who have no intention of being immoral or vicious. To many families, they are one of the comforts of life. A "private" dining-room with a six-foot partition would be just a little less private than a public room. How much better a discriminating and intelligent enforcement of the law than this ridiculously sweeping reform!

Concerning Dewey Day.

IT IS now two years since Dewey slid into the harbor of Manila and opened a new epoch in American history, and we have just been trying to celebrate the first anniversary. If we are to believe the telegraphic reports, the attempt was not a howling success anywhere except in Chicago, where the presence of the hero in the flesh stirred up some excitement. But in the main the American people, who are traditionally short on holidays, have failed to respond. It is not to be expected that they should, considering that Lincoln's birthday, although a holiday in some sections, is rarely observed, and that Grant was never honored to the extent of having a day set aside on the calendar for his remembrance. And still anyone not blinded by the yellow press will be ready to admit that Grant and Lincoln deserve more of remembrance than Dewey. I am not trying to belittle "Cousin Garge"; I am only trying to advance the view that heroism which lasts over months and years and stands every form of trial is more deserving than heroism which displays itself in the heat and blaze of one deed. I think that the American people realize this, and that they realize also the opera bouffe situation of a holiday in praise of a hero who is yet alive—and in politics. There are so many chances for a living hero to prove himself a false alarm.

There is another side to the question, however. May 1, 1898, marked the beginning of an epoch in American history, as clearly, almost, as did July 4, 1776. We are only two years away from it, are just beginning to feel its first, faint results, but we are already a different people from the one which waited for the McCollough's telegrams from Hongkong. How far and high the new impulse is to carry us, we can only guess, but it has taken us far enough already to prove that it is a substantial thing and not a phantasm. And it would be a fitting thing if the opening of the great epoch should be celebrated on the anniversary day of the deed which marked it. The difficulty comes in the name. Could it be called impersonally by some title which suggested its true meaning, could the name of the admiral be left out, I feel certain that it would survive. But "Dewey Day"—it is impossible!

Wealth and Happiness.

IT is an axiom that riches alone cannot bring happiness. Seattle has just brought forth a case in point. A poor man with a growing family struck it in the Klondike two years ago. One of his sons was married. With the accession of wealth to his parent he outgrew his wife and secured a divorce, which was raked through the newspapers and evoked a flood of unenviable notoriety on the family. Three weeks after this decree was granted, a married daughter followed suit, seeking divorce on the grounds of intemperance. The husband alleges that she didn't mind the bottle before her family became wealthy, and that he himself advanced the money which made the strike possible. Also, he talks of counter-complaints which will make his family-in-law squirm. An honest opinion from the old Klondiker on the power of happiness in wealth would be of some ethical value.

The Law's Delay in Alaska.

THE haphazard, hit-and-miss system of justice in Alaska is illustrated by a late judicial tangle in the southwestern district. There is now no means of administering the law there, because there is no recognized court and no judge. Civil and criminal cases which have already waited long enough in all conscience are laid over again to await the resumption of legal business. Judge Johnson of the district resigned last November in order to take up the practice of law at Cape Nome, and notified the government to that effect. Before the reply came, he started for the Coast. At Juneau, he intercepted a letter of acceptance, and thence proceeded at once to the new camp. Judge Brown, appointed his successor, was on his way to Washington when his appointment was made and is now at the capital urging certain clauses in the Alaska bill which, if passed, will shut him out completely since he is older than the age limit set therein for the Alaskan judiciary. Worse than all this, there is no United States Land Commissioner at Juneau, and there has been none for some time. No land claim can be made or recorded in this, the commercial center of Alaska, no disputed title can be settled, no squatter or claim-jumper can be brought to justice. Alaska is a neglected child in the sisterhood of states. It may not be generally known, but the grievance of special taxation of which Porto Rico has been complaining so loudly, has an exact parallel in Alaska. Special taxes on transportation, on Yukon passage on stamp mills, etc., are levied, paid and used, not for Alaska in especial, but for the benefit of the Treasury at large.

A Point in Law.

A COLORADO judge has made a decision which will not go down to future generations in the volumes of a law report, but which has its value just the same. A forger, the son of wealthy parents, was up before him, was convicted upon unmistakeable evidence, and was awaiting sentence. There was no hope of clearing the criminal, but a number of influential people interceded with the jurist, asking leniency "because he came of a good family." "I am sorry to hear it," said the judge, "because I will have to make the sentence heavier on that account. If he comes of a good family, he has had a chance, and ought to know better." It is a new way of looking at the subject, but after all there is justice in it. The criminal who comes of a low and perverted line should be shut up for the safety of society, but the actual moral wrong in his case is small. He may be presumed to be a moral idiot, without instinct or training for the right. The son of a "good family," on the other hand, may be presumed to know difference between vice and virtue, if he goes wrong, it is from active deviltry. The thing which restrains most judges in dealing with cases of the sort is sympathy for the criminal's family. But law is a hard thing; it was invented by the Romans, and has nothing to do with sympathy.

Society at Nome.

"THEY may live without friends, they may live without books," but Anglo-Saxons cannot live without society. The pioneers of our Oriental advance have been holding dances and playing tennis in Manila while their comrades shot at Tagalos, less than ten miles away. So, too, Nome City, the farthest town of our domain on the continent, has had its winter gaities in spite of the mercury. Although less than a year old, Nome has several social organizations. There is a regular club, with leather furniture and one of the half-dozen carpets in town. The Masons have a club and hope soon to organize a lodge. Then there is a debating society of which the mayor is president; it has met regularly all the winter and settled every momentous question which confronts the American people. The "Sour Dough Club" is a sort of Pioneer Society; only those who have been through a winter in the North are eligible for membership. This organization had the honor of giving the first ball in the town. The scarcity of women in camp was a drawback, but enough were mustered to start the grand march with over a hundred couples. The weather was below zero and ice cream was omitted from the bill of fare. The Masonic Club also burst into society on December 27, giving a ball just as "swell" and nearly as large. This was at the very darkest period of the winter night, and there was no dancing until dawn because dawn was still several days away when the dancers grew tired.

THE LEADING PERSONAGES IN THE CONTEST OVER THE FAIR ESTATE.

THE FAIR WILL CASE.

HISTORY OF CALIFORNIA'S LARGEST AND MOST FAMOUS INHERITANCE SUIT.

NO suit in the British Court of Chancery, where lawsuits are longest and most complicated, ever had the promise of long continuance, the complexety and entanglement of the Fair will case, now coming up for another stage in the courts of San Francisco. No American inheritance case ever involved so large an estate. And no legal case, in any country whatsoever, has been clogged with so many accusations of subsidiary crimes and misdemeanors. Forgery, conspiracy, perjury, theft, assault, battery are a few of the pleasant charges made by one side or the other. In the five years of its continuance, nearly every prominent lawyer in San Francisco has been mixed in the case with some one of the contending parties, and some of the greatest jurists and handwriting experts in the country have been called into consultation. The end is not even in sight. An authority of the San Francisco bar holds that the case will take anywhere from ten to twenty years for final settlement and that the lawyers on the winning side, or sides, will distribute at least a million dollars in fees. How much it will cost the state is a matter u; on which there has been no reckoning, but the sum will be a large one. The complications have been so numerous and so varied that a summary of the case as it now stands and of its devious history may be of general interest.

James Fair, one of the old California race of millionaire kings, died in December, 1894, at the Lick House, San Francisco. There was no one of his blood with him when he passed away. His son, with whom he was estranged, was in the city, and had been in his father's room shortly before, but was absent at the final moment; his daughters were on their way across the continent. Some servants and a young doctor who afterwards stood sponso for a will declared spurious by the courts were alone with him when he died. Had anyone whom he trusted been present, Fair might have dropped a word or a hint which would have saved millions in litigation. But it would have been hard for him to find a confident in all the world. He had partners, but no friends in the accepted sense of the term. His great fortune had been built up on suspicion. He distrusted everyone, regarded everyone as his enemy, his hand was against every man's, and he asked and gave no quarter. The manager of his huge Comstock interests was perhaps his closest associate, yet even he knew only so much of Fair's private business as would enable him to carry on his own work. Even the confidential bookkeepers knew of his affairs only as they read them in the open book accounts. Perhaps, had his daughters arrived in time, he might have said the words which would have prevented half this trouble and contention. But they were late, and he died with his lips sealed.

Fair's estate footed up to some fifteen millions. It had been greater than that a few years before, but the failure of an attempted corner in wheat, the only mistake in finances during his long career, shaved off a large section. He had accumulated it all by his thirty years of hard work as a Comstock miner. Others made as much out of the Comstock as he did, but it was Fair's absolute genius for finance which rendered the venture a success. He had added railroad ventures to his other operations in his later years and was almost as successful in that direction as in mining. It was only when he went into the unlucky wheat deal mentioned above that his accumulation of wealth received a check.

When Fair's will was opened, it was found to be a remarkable document. Drawn in September, 1894, a few months before his death, it was apparently correct legally. The unusual feature was a trust clause which has made it famous the world over. The estate was practically entailed. The bulk of the fortune was left to his three children, Mrs. Herman Oeblrichs, Miss Virginia Fair, now Mrs. W. K. Vanderbilt, Jr., and Charles L. Fair, but only for the term of their natural lives. When the last of these three should die, the entailed part of the estate was to be divided as follows:—one-quarter was to go to the heirs of Mrs. Oebrichs, one-quarter to the heirs of Miss Fair, and the remaining portion to the heirs of Fair's brothers. The children of Charles L. Fair were to receive nothing at all. A peculiar clause, which had a bearing on a contention made later in connection with the will, provided that if any woman should prove that she was his legal widow, she should be paid fifty dollars. In this manner, he sought to evade a rock which has wrecked the will of many another western millionaire. W. S. Goodfellow, Jas. S. Angus and Fair's nephew, Thos. G. Crothers, were appointed executors to carry out the provisions of the will during the lifetime of the three direct heirs-at-law.

The contentions which have marked the whole case began almost immediately. At first, the heirs refrained from an attempt to break the trust clause, and Mrs. Nettie Craven, who has become the main figure in the case, did not show her hand at once. The initial move was the presentation of a pencil will which Dr. Marc Livingston, Fair's physician, declared to have been written by t e millionaire a few days before his death. This was a simple document, leaving the estate without extra provision to the three children. Hardly had this been filed for probate, when the famous Craven claim appeared. Mrs. Craven, then a public-school principal, filed a contest on the ground that she was Fair's legal wife, and that she was in possession of a contract by which he recognized her as such, a marriage of the sort being then legal in California. In addition, she claimed that the dead millionaire had recognized her as his wife, and that she had been given deeds, written in lead-pencil, conveying to her real estate valued at a million and a half. The pencil will was submitted to the courts and withdrawn, and the documen of Sept. 1894, admitted to be genuine, came to probate. The withdrawal of the pencil will constituted the first mystery of this case of mysteries. It has withdrawn with the consent of Delmas, representing the Craven interest, and notwithstanding the fact that it did not contain, as did the trust will, the clause bequeathing to a proved widow fifty dollars as a sop to a release of claims. It is the general opinion that this action was caused by the fear that, should the pencil will be declared a forgery, it would tend to place Mrs. Craven's pencil deeds in the same category.

Mrs. Craven was showing her hand by this time. In the beginning, her interests were, to a certain extent, identical with those of Charles Fair. It was not enough that she prove herself the widow of Fair Sr.; she must also break the trust clause of the genuine will. Fair's interests, or, at least, those of his heirs, demanded that he break this will also, since otherwise his children could not inherit. To him also, then, the course of self-interest would seem to have lain in a contest of the genuine testament and the upholding of the pencil will. But he, too, fought the Livingston document and was a party to the tacit agreement by which it was dropped. The daughters were seeking, all this time, to compromise. It was understood that they held themselves willing to provide for their brother's heirs should he see fit to drop the contest of the trust clause. It is definitely known that they offered Mrs. Craven large sums to secure a compromise. Mrs. Craven refused, and the great contest was fairly on. For four years it has been fought with all possible vigor, and is likely to last for many times four years more. In the contest over the deeds alleged to have been given her by Fair, Mrs. Craven lost the rest of her contentions are still open.

Meanwhile, the trust clause had its share of litigation. The original draft of the trust will was stolen from the County Clerk's office early in the game, but the attorneys for the Fair executors had taken the precaution to save certified copies, thus preventing what might have been a sudden and unexpected ending to the case. On Nov. 16, 1899, the instrument was admitted to probate by Judge Slack. The estate had increased, in that period, from $15,000,000 to $20,000,000. It was known at the time that the three children objected strenuously to the trust clause and they had previously filed a suit to have this clause declared invalid so far as it applied to the real estate. This suit, Judge Slack decided in the affirmative and ordered a partial distribution of the real estate. He held, however, that the trust provisions must govern the income from securities. After waiting nearly the whole year allowed by law, the three children of Fair on Nov. 15, 1897, filed a contest against the three trustees, to test the validity of the trust clause. The theory of the lawyers was that should the Supreme Court of California sustain the ruling of Judge Slack that the trust clause did not apply to the real estate, then this contest could be dropped. But if the Supreme Court reversed Judge Slack, then they would push this contest to the end and as a last resort carry it on appeal to the United States Supreme Court. To clinch another point, Charles L. Fair, through his attorneys, filed a petition setting forth that his father was not of sound mind when he executed the trust will. He declared that his father was especially influenced against him by designing persons and was led to cut off his children from a share in the benefits of the estate, although several months previous to the drawing of this will his father had summoned him and freely forgiven him for all past differences and had assured him there would be no discrimination against hin in his will.

The appeal of the three children of Fair to the State Supreme Court from Judge Slack's decision was not decided until Feb. 26, 1900. Then the court, by four to three, decided that the trust will is valid both as applied to real estate and securities, and that the income only can be enjoyed by the three children of Senator Fair during their lives. It decided also that Charles Fair's children shall have no share in the estate; that one-half of the estate shall be divided, at the death of the last of the three heirs direct, equally among the issue of Mrs. Hermann Oelrichs and Mrs. W. K. Vanderbilt, Jr., and the other half shall go to the heirs of Fair's brothers. Incidentally, this decision gave Mrs. Craven $50 should she estab ish her contention that she is Fair's widow. It also gave the three trustees full power to administer the big $20,000,000 estate during the lives of the heirs.

With the declaration in favor of the trust will, Mrs. Craven's chances for a widow's share of the estate vanished entirely. It made no difference whether or no she proved her right to be considered James Fair's widow; in case she did prove it, she would receive only fifty dollars. Therefore, she took a new tack. Her suit to secure a marriage allowance from the estate was begun in February. This trial is still before the courts of the city. The stirring events which marked its early stages—the declaration of Justice Simpton that he had married Fair and Mrs. Craven, his s bsequent declaration that he had committed perjury in making the statement, the charges of subornation and perjury on both sides, the Barling assault, the accusations of attorneys on both sides—are still fresh in the public m'nd. In the opinion of most lawyers, the criminal courts will have to thresh out these charges when the civil courts have done with the present stage of the case.

JOHN STOLLARD.

THE CAPE DUTCH.

A TURBULENT ELEMENT WHICH IS OPPOSING GREAT BRITAIN BY UNDERHANDED TACTICS.

THE general opinion of those competent to know about the trend of affairs in the South African muddle is that the Boer republics are to become a crown colony of the British Empire when Roberts, Kitchener, et. al. shall have finished the work cut out for them in South Africa. The time has passed when independence could be considered as a possibility, and the most the Boers can hope for in final settlement is the concession of an independent Colonial government like that of Canada. The individual Boers, from Kruger down, will lose nothing in personal liberty, property or privileges through their defense of their own cause. There has been some rabid talk in England of sending the old fox to St. Helena, but it is only talk. No Englishman who knows enough about politics to speak with authority believes for one moment that the vengeance of the Empire is to be visited on Oom Paul. A temporary "enforced residence" at St. Helena while peace negotiations are going on is the most that can be expected. The case of Napoleon was a different proposition entirely. The Scourge of Europe had to be penned up preforce, because his presence abroad constituted a living danger to the Empire and to the civilized world. It is different with Paul Kruger; his age alone places him beyond the possibility of much mischief.

Beyond the shadow of a doubt, a person in Kruger's position as regards the British Empire would have been hanged on short notice a century ago. The American Revolutionists were given to understand in no uncertain terms that a rope was waiting for Washington, Hancock and others should they fall into British hands. Franklin's grim joke: "We must hang together or we we will hang separately," was more than a bon mot. At that time, and for many decades thereafter, a rebel, even a rebel of remote degree like Kruger, went into his revolution with the pleasant certainty that defeat and capture meant death. To America belongs the honor of breaking this rule. When Jefferson Davis and the other leaders of the Southern Confederacy were taken into camp after the civil war, Europe rather expected that they would be summarily dealt with, or at least imprisoned for life. To the surprise of the world, Davis and his compatriots were held only until the new "carpet-bag" rule was set going in the South. Other governments have followed this example; only the Latin nations, Spain in especial, keep to the old idea. Rizal, the Filipino leader, Maximilian in Mexico, and numerous dictators and arch-rebels in the Latin-American republics are examples of this survival. But the northern nations have departed from the rule in cases where the rebels have fought them fairly and honorably.

There is another factor in this war, however, a factor which is certain to cause trouble in the final settlement. There has been much covert and underhanded warfare among British subjects of Dutch blood in Cape Colony and Natal. This is a different thing from absolute rebellion; the plain name for it is treason. To make a comparison, let us suppose that the United States should come to war with France. Should the thousands of naturalized Frenchmen within our borders rise up to join their countrymen in such an event, all would be well and good. Far different would it be if they should act, as the Dutch element in Cape Colony has done, through indirect methods. There has not been, there probably never will be, a direct and open rising of the Cape Dutch. But in every other way they have sought to assist the Boers and hamper the British. They have blown up culverts and torn up railroads. They have destroyed stores and provisions. They have continually reported to the Boer army the movements and intentions of their "ruineck" opponents. They have connived, before and after the war, in the smuggling of arms and supplies into the Transvaal. And, finally, they have worked continually toward obtaining an official declaration of sympathy from the Cape Parliament. Such tactics pursued by the Franco-Americans in the hypothetical war with France would lead to rough measures on our part. The only reason for hesitation on the part of Great Britain is the fear of a general uprising, a well-grounded apprehension lest this covert rebellion should become open and organized should strong means be employed. Then, there are a great many of the Cape Dutch, and should the British once begin to punish their treasonable actions, they would be obliged to divert valuable energy from the main campaign. As near as can be ascertained, some fifteen thousand of them have taken up arms and are with the Transvaal Boers openly, but a great many more than this are working by secret and underhanded means.

That Kipling's strong letter to Harpers Weekly describes the situation exactly, is the opinion of those most familiar with South African affairs. The Cape Dutch have lived for several generations under British rule, enjoying the same privileges as the English-born colonists, yet they have never been weaned away from their loyalty to the parent stock. Doubtless, part of this is due to the natural tenacity and conservatism of the race, but proximity has probably still more to do with it. Let a German emigrate to the United States, and he goes so far away from the mother-country that he is beyond all direct influence of blood; his children are as American as anyone, because America is the only environment which they have known. But suppose that Germany were right over the border where the old influence would be felt and suppose that our German-Americans lived in great colonies instead of dwelling scattered and distributed among people of other blood, and the case would be very different. National ideas and traditions would then be kept warm and alive. This is the situation in Cape Colony and Northern Natal, and this accounts for the prevalence of treason. There are whole districts in both the British Colonies where Englishmen have never dared to assert their loyalty if they wished to keep any social or financial standing in the community. This in spite of the continuous efforts made by the home government to placate this dissatisfied element.

When the war is ended, the British government must de-

DETECTING FORGERIES.

THE SIGNS OF HANDWRITING AS APPLIED TO FRAUDULENT SIGNATURES.

THEODORE KYTKA,
alias Jim the Penman.

THE REVIVAL of the Fair litigation, which hinges entirely upon a question of penmanship, calls renewed attention to the profession of the expert in handwriting. Of all the specialists concerned in the detection of crime, none are scarcer or better paid than these. They deserve the high fees which they receive, for the authority on handwriting must undergo years of training in order to perfect himself in his specialty and must be both a scientist and an artist. Moreover, he must have a reputation absolutely above reproach; once let his name be associated with doubtful practices, and his usefulness as an agent of justice is at an end. There are not over a dozen experts of recognized standing in the whole country, and courts and juries must take their word for almost everything.

The art and science of detecting forgeries in handwriting is Greek to the average person. It is easy enough to distinguish between a genuine signature and a poorly executed copy. Anyone with common sense can do that. But the detection of work done by a skilled forger, with all known appliances for exact production, is a different matter. Forgeries which are glaring frauds to the expert would defy the closest scrutiny of the inexpert. Even the expert would fail, were it not that he works upon scientific formulas, upon lines so well-defined and exact that there can be no deviation. The art of the business comes in a mysterious sixth sense, an instinct for forgery. This sense is the one possessed by expert paying tellers, who "smell" a forgery, they cannot tell why. But the expert must go beyond this point. It is not enough for him to believe in his special senses that a document is forged, he must convince a cold-blooded judge and jury.

There are three characteristics of every hand which cannot be imitated by a forger, and upon these almost all forgeries break before going further. The first is sex; here the signs are unmistakeable. The second is age. Just what constitutes the signs of age in handwriting is a point upon which most experts differ, but they are not to be mistaken. The third is speed. A slow writer cannot imitate a fast one.

Beyond this, every forgery has its foil, as every poison has its antidote. There is not a trick, a dodge of the expert criminal which does not have its method of detection. In examining the separate letters of a piece of writing, the expert looks first for the following distinctive traits: size, shading, position relative to the horizontal line, inclination relative to the vertical line, sharpening of the curves and angles, proportion and elaboration of the different parts of a word or signature. In scarcely one of these particulars can a man imitate a single letter so exactly that it cannot be detected by microsopical examination.

Now, it happens that Nature has given to every human being a natural handwriting as individual and distinctive as his face or his manners or gestures. No one has ever explained just why it is that a person must needs write in his own style and cannot write in any other; it is a fact, and that is all that we can say. Take the first blundering efforts of children in school, when they are set to copy letters of regular form, and they show individuality. This child makes a pointed n, the other a round one; this child forms his l long and slender, the other makes it short and broad. Go on up to the expert writers who engross resolutions at fancy prices, and there is a difference, more subtle, but just as pronounced. No writer ever known to the world has been able to reach the point where his writing became exactly like the models of the copy-books.

This fact is the safeguard of society. However cleverly the forger has worked, however much he has sought to sink his identity, there remain those subtle differences However closely he may study, however diligently practice the dozen or less words of a signature, the forger leaves some loophole open, misses some microscopical point where he fails to sink his own personality in that of the victim. There are three insuperable difficulties. The first is the set of personal characteristics in the hand to be imitated; the second is the set of personal characteristics in the hand of the forger; the third is the difficulty of making the hand follow the eye.

There are four classes of forgers, according to the methods employed. In the first class is the one who works carefully, line for line, with the signature which he is copying in front of him. This is perhaps the commonest from and is the easiest of detection, owing to the fact that the speed must be changed. It is most successful where the handwriting imitated is crude, complicated or slow. The next most common forgery is on the memory system. In this method, the forger practices the signature to be imitated until he feels able to reproduce it, write it off without hesitation. When practiced by a real expert, this kind is the most difficult of detection. The third class of forger works by tracing. This deceives the naked eye, but falls before microscopical or photographic analysis. The fourth class works by photography, and is invariably detected by chemical treatment. Indeed, the experts say that this method tells its own story on the face, that even a paying teller who knows his business can detect such a signature when it is passed over his desk.

In making the statement that a forgery stands less than one chance in a hundred of ultimate detection, a difference and a distinction must be made between two classes. The first is the out-and-out forger of checks, whose only object is to present the paper for cursory examination, take the money and get out of the way of the police before he is detected. In this case the expert forger stands a good chance of success, the ordinary precautions observed by banks and the sixth sense of the teller being the only obstacles. These forgeries are, of course, discovered in the balances, and there is no object in making the fraud so perfect that it may deceive the handwriting expert. Bank officials, if they are honest, will admit that the successful perpetration of this class of crime is much commoner than the public supposes. Unless the criminal is caught and it becomes an object to declare the fraud in order to punish him, bank officials rarely reveal a forgery, on account of the danger of destroying public confidence. In the other class, the one where the forger must be most skillful, is the criminal who manufactures false signatures for legal documents.

Among the most recent discoveries made in connection with the analysis of forged handwriting is that of the macro-photographic process, as elaborated and applied by Mr. Theodore Kytka of San Francisco, the youngest expert in the United States. By this process he enlarges photographs with such exactness that the work produced is superior to that of the microscope. One of the most celebrated cases in criminal jurisprudence was his demonstration of the method employed by Carl Becker, admitted as being the most famous forger of the century. Mr. Kytka applied the opal process and restored the $22,000 draft on the Crocker-Woolworth bank, originally made out for $12 and raised by Becker to $22,000. At present, Mr. Becker is working in the shoe factory at San Quentin.

The Botkin case, the Quackenbush marriage contract, and the William Murdock note case for $480,000 are among the large cases in which Mr. Kytka has figured. Among the more recent trials in which this modern process has been applied is the Alfred Fuller will case in Oroville. To this clever and simple method the State of California is indebted for landing behind the bars of San Quentin for twelve years Dr. Rodley, Mayor of Chico, convicted of forgery and perjury.

For the past five years, more or less, Mr. Kytka has been engaged on the celebrated Craven-Fair case. In this period he has produced over 20,000 photographs, being either contact prints, enlargements or micro-photographs. His selection as expert in the case was vitually a competition, in which the best experts in Europe and America contested, and Mr. Kytka beat them all. At present, he is engaged in the production of a photograph which Attorney Crothers calls one of the grandest specimens of photography ever produced in a court of justice.

cide on some course of action toward those who have enjoyed in this open rebellion and underhanded treason. Wholesale execution of those who have performed treasonable acts such as the destruction of supplies and the bearing of information to the enemy is, of course, entirely out of question. So, too, is wholesale arrest. Their numbers are so great that they would fill every prison in the Empire. The most feasible course, the one to which many Tory statesman have already committed themselves, is the tempory or permanent disenfranchisement of all who are proved to have taken this treasonable stand. Whether those who have openly joined the Boer army will be included in this act is an open question.

ETIENNE MARCEL.

The fortune of the late Baron Adolphe de Rothschild, estimated at about 200,000,000 francs, has been left to his wife. The collection of choice pictures, the planting of his Swiss and Austrian estates, and the lovely gardens and immense greenhouses (which rival those of Kew) at Pregny, his domain near Geneva, were the occupations and amusements of the late Baron's life. He cared nothing for general society, to which the Baroness is also indifferent, and the only great personages they troubled themselves to entertain were the late Empress of Austria and her sisters, the ex-Queen of Naples, to whom they were most kind and faithful friends

The Avenue Louise in Brussels is lined with chestnut trees, and an electric tramway runs along one side; the chestnuts on that side lose their leaves in August, then bud again and bloom again in October, while those on the other side keep their foliage till near the end of the year and only bloom again the following spring. It is believed that the electric current of the tramway, passing through the ground, affects the roots, and causes the abnormal behavior of the trees. It has long been known that electricity in the soil does influence vegetable growth.

According to Dr. W. B. Jenkins, in the Medical Record, it is not good to read with the print too near the eyes. Objects too near require a strong effort of the ciliary muscle, which controls the crystalline lens, to see them well, and it is probable that the farthest distance at which one can see the print distinctly is the best for the sight. The distance varies with habit and the state of the eyes, but in general is over fourteen inches.

That fatal disease, tetanus, or lockjaw, is propagated by the fodder of horses which conveys the germ of it, and the Medical News of New York points out that, with the advent of the motor car in cities, it will probably diminish, or even die out altogether.

The Queen of Roumania ("Carmen Sylva") has again shown her sympathy with England by writing a poem praising the attitude of Great Britain in South Africa.

The House of Lords was much amused the other day a an action of the Duke of Devonshire. At the end of a singularly dull debate about the circulation of papers respecting London university, the Duke got up, advanced to the table, put his hat upon it, and after a few minutes' deep deliberation put on his hat again, and sat down. He had not said a word, and his mind on the great question remains one of the unsolved mysteries of the world.

As a sample of the difference between the nations on morality prevalent on the Atlantic and Pacific Coasts, it may be mentioned that the Boston City Council is trying to pass a measure permitting the sale of tobacco on Sunday and is meeting with determined opposition. The only goods which may be dispensed in the modern Athens on the Sabbath are newspapers, drugs, milk and bread, and these only between certain specified hours.

Wire fences are now regarded by agriculturists as "death-traps" because many cows and other domestic animals which happen to be near them are killed by lightning. There is, however, a means of rendering them harmless. The director of the Weather and Crop Service of Iowa recommends connecting them to "earth" by wires after the manner of lightning-rods.

The new Chinese minister at Washington, being interviewed on the reforms most necessary for the improvement of this country, advocates "more cloth at the top of your women's dresses and less at the bottom."

As Seen by Leila.

AFTER so many years of the frivolities of my small sister, it is rather difficult for me to know how to interest you. I suppose I should first tell you of Cricket's wedding. It was a wonderful affair. She had the twelve girls who made their debut with her, as bridesmaids. It is quite bewildering to me to know whether I should speak of the bridesmaids, three of them being married and one having two children. Cricket would have them, however, to represent bridesmaids. As they are some of the happy people who can look upon life as nothing but a joke, they consented. These girls all wore cream white crepe gowns, the skirts all tucked and made over pink slips, so the effect, I thought, was charming. Cricket's married friends looked quite as young and pretty as those who have not yet taken the real responsibility of life on their shoulders. In fact, I could find no fault whatever with any of the arrangements. Cricket's gown was pearl colored satin, but she is too small to make as fine a looking bride as either Emilie Hager D.an or Helen Thomas Kimble. Still, she suited the Ideal. One is only responsible for one's husband, or one's friends, so I feel I can find any fault I wish with my small sister. Of course, I know she is a dear little girl, and has made an excellent match, and is extremely popular, nevertheless, I do hope now that she is married she will look upon life a little more seriously. A great many people wondered why I was not Cricket's maid of honor. Such an absurd idea never entered my head. Just fancy being maid of honor to one's small sister! It would be an exceedingly irrelevant state of affairs, I think.

The church was decorated in field flowers of every variety, and the green was composed of the different uncultivated grasses. It was all carried out under Cricket's directions, I believe. She managed everything herself, even to the ordering of the breakfast and packing of her trunks. I never have seen such a child in my life. It really tired me out to see her. I hope her "Ideal," as she calls her husband, will not let her marvellous vivacity carry them off to Europe. I find him a very congenial person, and shall miss him very much. We miss Cricket, though continuous chattering and laughter is apt to wear one out. I am so fond of really serious conversation. Perhaps that is one reason I find so much pleasure in women's clubs. I do not know what I should do without my one afternoon a week at the Century. As for the Fortnightly, I find that in belonging to it, I never become rusty in my interest in the large things of this world. Years ago, when I was a debutante, I honestly believe that girls were less frivolous than they are today. Of course, we danced and engaged in a few flirtations of a mild sort, but we certainly never dictated nor were so particular as the buds have been this winter. Even Cricket exasperated me, at times. Why, that child absolutely refused invitations to luncheons, for she hated girlie affairs, as she called them. She would not accept an invitation to a dinner until she knew between what men she was to sit. She only saw the men she liked of a Sunday afternoon, to the others she said in her careless, little coquettish manner, of which I disapprove most strongly, "Oh, yes, you are good enough to dance with, but to talk to, not if I know it. None but my own special crushes ever get in here." These youths considered her pretty and witty, and called again. When I was a maiden of Cricket's age, such behavior would have been, to say the least of it, most unbecoming and insolent. The men would have never called again, and certainly ignored my presence at any party. Yet I was called the "superb Miss Leila," the "belle of the season," and other newspaper terms.

Entertaining then was on a far larger and more magnificent stage. There were the Greenway cotillions. Nothing today here can in any way be compared to these. The decorations, suppers and gowns of the girls were simply superb. Private parties, too, were very much in vogue. There were but few teas, and I am thankful for that, for I know of no form of entertainment at which a person of my stamp shows to less advantage. Cricket could fly about, and see all her friends, and apparently have a "fierce time," as she slangily expressed it, but I saunter around thickly crowded rooms, and become irritated and made miserable by the noise, and crowd, and lack of dignity in the whole affair. I need a ball room to appear as I like. Of course, a dinner is quite acceptable—but these dinner dances—I have indeed a great deal for which to be thankful—they did not exist in my time. We had large dinners, too, but the men were all sufficiently entertaining to talk to after dinner. Occasionally we had a little singing or music, and the affairs were, I acknowledged to myself then, quite pleasant. These boys and girls have really so little to say. They talk college life. I disapprove of co-education and fraternites. This California fraternity life where young boys actually are allowed to drink and play cards and entertain as though they were men! To me it is most detrimental to them morally and physically. I dare hardly express my opinion about this sort of thing before Arthur or Cricket, they find so much humor in it. Alas! I fear this decadent spirit of the age has struck them quite deeply, and they lack the judgment of seeing how permeated with evil this sort of life must necessarily be for young boys and girls.

Another thing which I must criticise is the manner of the up-to-date "engaged girl." She might almost as well be married. At a dance she spends the whole evening at the side of her fiancee. Neither dreams that there are other girls or men who need a little of this young man's or girl's society. She does not care, she likes this way of doing things, so she goes along ignoring all possible politeness or thoughtfulness of her hostess. One would hardly dare to ask this girl to any entertainment without her fiancee. She rides and drives and walks alone with him. In fact I think she sets so little value on herself that after a while older people wonder that the young man can care so much for something that is so easy to get whenever he pleases to have it. But, I suppose the men are as lax as the girls and I must, with the aid of a few of my friends, endeavor to bring about a reform.

MRS. FRED KIMBLE, formerly Miss Helen Thomas, married at the First Uniterian Church, April 25th.

Cricket received a letter from Mary Crocker on Monday asking her to be one of her bridesmaids, as she is to be married in June. Mary Scott, Caro Crockett and Genevieve Carolan are to be the others. Of course, Cricket being married I had to write and explain to Mary. I am sorry it is not to take place in San Francisco. I think I might enjoy meeting Mr. Burton Harrison. He is quite a charming fellow, I believe.

Wednesday mama and I had a very charming time at Mrs. Burke Halliday's. I like Mrs. Collis P. Huntington and find her exceedingly well read, one of the women who get the very best there is out of life. She knows the books to read, is up on all the interesting things of the day, and is very accurate. I do like accuracy in women. The table was a mass of eschscholtzias and I liked the effect very much.

Mrs. Maus's luncheon at the University Club was composed of girls of all ages and seasons. Cricket and I each had a nice time as we found girls of our own season there.

I received at Mrs. Kittle's tea on Thursday last. It was not large enough to prove disastrous to my feelings, so I had a pleasant afternoon. It was given in honor of Miss Anna Scott, who is here on a visit from Washington, D. C. Miss Scott and I found a great deal in common, as Mr. Lexetre, my fiancee, and her brother are college friends.

Dear Diary, forgive my letter. After one passes through as many stages of the game as I have, one speaks from experienae.

Cricket asked me particularly not to forget to announce the engagement of Miss Ethel Dorothy Patton to Mr. R. Nagelmachers.

Mrs. Patton and Ethel are to spend some months on the continent before her marriage.

Were Cricket writing this, she would go deeply into particulars, but all I can wish them is all the happiness as nice a girl as I have always found Ethel, can have.

Cricket particularly told me to tell you dear Diary (Dear for your willingness to listen to her prattle for so long) what an exceedingly good time Arthur and she had at Alysse Latham's tea in San Anselmo last Saturday afternoon. It was quite a large affair. Most of her friends live on this side of the Bay so the fun on boats was a sort of prelude of the entertainment. The Lathams own an exceedingly attractive home with a beautiful garden. The roses were blooming everywhere, and hanging from the veranda of the house in heavy masses. Cricket said the whole garden was so full of flowers it quite looked as though it might have been decorated for the occasion. All the girls and young men of the younger set were present and, if I can judge by Cricket, spent a splendid afternoon. I like Alysse Latham, she has a fine, strong character, and I quite approve too of Wyatt Allen, and think that they will make their home very attractive not only to the young but also to the older people.

Mr. Edward Baker is one of the New York men now in San Francisco who is doing quite a good deal of quiet entertaining. He is a stranger here, but has been so well liked that he was invited everywhere. He is now giving theatre parties with a supper afterwards to his friends. In fact he is reciprocating kindness, an act so little understood by the men of today. People do not expect it, one hears young men say. No that is true, but people do appreciate the unexpected exceedingly when it is done.

Katherine Dillon gave quite a large dinner to Anna Voorhies on Wednesday evening. As is usual in Mrs. Casey's house the Worns' decorated the table. It is hardly necessary to remark further upon it, except to say it was quite as effective a table as any one ever expects to see. After dinner Fosselli the Palmist came in and a great deal of fun was enjoyed hearing of the things one might or might not do, had one only a little less laziness in one's composition. A palmist once told Cricket she would make a great pianist. We suffered untold agonies listening to her constant practising. Fortunately, Cricket's strong point was not perseverance, realizing how long it would take to do anything really of any merit she gave it up, and now never plays anything but ragtime music and sings coon songs.

IN BOOKDOM

IT IS both inconvenient and dangerous, as Mark Twain has many times complained, to have the reputation of being a humorist. It almost unqualifies an author for serious work. After the first funny book, people read everything a man writes for the joke he has hidden somewhere behind his words. The more serious, the better the joke. He can no more make anyone believe him to be a plain-spoken pen-and-ink prophet. He cannot even make his publishers believe it, if he has ever in his life written a king's fool's jest book.

The Harpers have just published Max O'Rell's first novel, Woman and Artist by title. There is nothing particularly funny about the book. It is not humorous. It is not witty. It does not consist of nonsense chiefly. Instead, it is an entirely serious and sympathetic little study of an estrangement that grew up between two young married people of the artistic temperament in London. In a way it is tragic, for their only child dies while these true lovers are separated. And yet the publishers thus announce the volume: "An amusing tale of a London artist who attempts to sell a patent to both the French and Russian governments. As a result both he and his wife become entangled in a series of diplomatic complications."

I do not see how publishers can have the heart to censure reviewers for not reading the volumes they write about when they themselves display such gross ignorance in relation to their own books. This too upon a book's own protective wrapper; words distinctly intended for the prospective purchaser to guide him in his choice; perhaps even intended for the reviewer, to guide him in his judgment. Such things have been.

This is the story. A young artist and his wife have been happily married for five years when the man invents a new shell. He wishes to make himself and wife independently rich. He begins by selling his invention to France, and then tries Russia. The Russian agent becomes infatuated with the inventor's wife before the negotiations are closed; but her husband advises her not to seem to notice it. At the last the direct insult is given, and the wife, thinking that the husband has been playing her off for his own pecuniary gain, will have nothing more to do with him. Then there is a duel, contracts are torn up, a friend effects a reconciliation, and the two artists (the wife also is an artist) revert to their former ideals of happiness. Although the action is a little improbable, there are some very pretty touches in the book, and some good analysis of character. The story is interesting throughout. It would probably never occur to anyone, however, except the young man who "guessed out" the publishers' advertisement, to call it "an amusing tale of a London artist who attempts to sell a patent."

The Prose of Edward Rowland Sill is the self-explanatory title of a new piece of editing that will interest Professor Sill's friends on the Coast. The contents of the book are largely drawn from the "Contributors' Club" in the Atlantic Monthly; although many of the longer papers first received publicity as lectures or as more formal magazine articles. I wish to quote two or three paragraphs from one of the little essays on the use of words:

It is interesting to notice what a difference there is in words as to their atmosphere. Two terms that the dictionaries give as being nearly or quite synonymous may have widely different values for literary use. Each has its own enveloping suggestiveness—"airs from Heaven," or emanations from elsewhere. Of two words denoting the same object or action, one may come drawing with it "alight, a glory, a fair luminous cloud;" the other bringing a disagreeable smudge. Accordingly, in the literary art, it is not enough to use language with an exact sense of definitions; one must add to this logical precision a nice instinct for atmospheric effect. Just as a tone of a particular pitch is one thing on a flute, and another on a horn, each having its own timbre, so a term having a precise meaning is one thing if it has dropped caroling out of Grecian skies, and from the delicate hands of Keats and Shelley, but quite another thing if it has come clattering and rumbling up out of clod-hoppers' horse-talk. Moreover, just as the difference between tones on various instruments is due to their diverse groups of harmonic over-tones, one superposed on another, so the individual atmosphere of any word comes from its having its own composite set of associations, some faint and vague, some strong and definite, that have through all its history been clustering upon it.

In that passage from Wordsworth's "Brougham Castle"—a warm bit of color that stands out from a cold poem like a flash of red sunset on bare trees in the snow,—

> Armor rusting in his halls
> On the blood of Clifford calls;
> "Quell the Scot!" exclaims the Lance;
> "Bear me to the heart of France!"
> Is the longing of the Shield.

What could have been substituted for quell? Crush, beat, kill, smash,—either would have been out of the question. Or what could have been used instead of bear? Bring, take, fetch, lug,—each is impossible. Quell and bear, by the way, are not terms of every-day use in common speech; yet this is the poet who is popularly supposed, by those who have read about him more than they have read him, to have abjured all merely literary language.

The truth is, as Mr. Sill points out, that Wordsworth's distinction is rather that of "having passed honest coins instead of counters." He continues:

No doubt one of the most charming among the atmospheric qualities of words is the inevitable suggestion of sincerity in their use which clings about the homely diction of every-day intercourse. Not only Wordsworth, but all of the good modern poets, sing for the most part in the same language in which they would talk; and, for that matter, did not Chaucer, and did not Shakespeare? The best literature and the best conversation contrive to get on with but one vocabulary. It is only the dreary scribblers that persist in prodding our inattentive brains with startling forms of speech. It is already merry times in literature when we are not any longer afraid of our mother tongue. We instinctively sheer off from any writer who uses what Rogers called "album words." Certain type-metal terms have come to serve as ear-marks of insincerity and of the mere ambition to write something,—terms that are never used in honest speech, and the employment of which in conversation would make a man feel absurd. When we find the ideas common and the words uncommon we have learned that we may as well put down the volume, or turn the leaf of the magazine.

Here is a paragraph from another paper, the application of which to current San Francisco "art" squabbles it is not my intention to hint at. I quote it for quite another purpose, as showing a phase of Mr. Sill's more serious work in critical prose. I quote it for the purpose of interesting the reader in this suggestive book, so that he will desire to read further in it. Mr Sill is talking about the principles of criticism:

The secret of all art is then within the reach of our hand when we have realized one single fact concerning man. As we look out upon life we see its myriad activities all springing from certain desires. But there is one desire among them which is permanent, and paramount to all. It is not the desire for mere pleasure, for it often overrides that; it is not the desire for mere happiness, even, for it often overrides that. It is the desire for life: not the poor negative desire to escape death and cling to existence, merely, but the aspiration for full and abounding life. To be alive in every faculty; to have the greatest possible total of conscious being, in physical impression and effect, in intellectual force and grasp, in emotional glow, in the out-stream of the active will; in short, completely to be and live: this is the one paramount human desire. There is only one thing we really dread: it is death. There is only one thing we really desire; it is life.

And now where is to be found a perpetual source of this power and activity that we perpetually desire? Nowhere but in the expressed power and activity of other human spirits,—and that is art.

We have seen that in their very elements the arts are based on the ability to satisfy this desire. For the beauty of form consists in giving the sense of sight its greatest total of unchecked apprehension; and the beauty of tone, both in those consecutive harmonies which we call melodies, and in amassed harmonies, in giving the sense of hearing its greatest total of uninterrupted impression. And when we pass beyond mere sensuous delight we find the same essential effect—but on the mind now, and the whole soul—from the ideas expressed by the artist.

The test, then, for all art is that expressing much life it shall give much life. That painting, statue, symphony, is the greatest which adds the greatest total to our conscious existence. But we must mark well a distinction here. There are higher or lower grades or planes of existence. But by what test? By no other than this same test,—their tendency for or against renewed and increased life in the whole nature. That pleasure is low which tends to belittle the nature; that one is high which tends to enlarge it. That art is low which only stimulates feelings and ideas most apt to brutalize; that is to say, to restrict and narrow (for that is the distinction between brute and man,—the one little, the other large, in powers and possibilities). That art is high which awakens feelings and ideas that are vital with tendencies toward more and still more of attainment and being.

The book is published by Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston.

Mr. David Lubin has just published a series of popular papers upon economic and religious subjects that will probably be read with considerable zest by people with unsettled views in these matters. He calls his book Let There Be Light. Six seekers for the truth consecrate their lives to certain principles which they think they have discovered in their debating, under the belief that their discoveries will lead to "tangible and potent changes" in the world of economics and religion. They formulate their beliefs, they devise methods of promulgating and perpetuating them, and they deliver to the world a plan for a new church, and an outline of a new social order. The "six" consist of an Irishman, a German, an Italian, a Jew, a negro, and an American Instead of bringing home the evils in the world, and especially in the industrial world, to the "crime of '73," these thinkers conclude that the causes of the inequality of which they feel the burden are to be found in the defects of existing religious systems. The new apostles arrive at a philosophy that will startle and antagonize most people who believe themselves to have come to a final conclusion in economics or religion; but it cannot make much difference to them, after all, for they will probably never know of the book's existence. Mr. Lubin's truths are not new truths but old, old truths; his fallacies are not new fallacies but old, old fallacies. And his ambition to found a modern church is not a new ambition. Published by G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York.

Probably the best illustrated book of its kind that has yet appeared is Mr. Tappan Adney's The Klondike Stampede, being an account of the great rush to the North in 1897, and of life and conditions in the Yukon since that time. Mr. Adney was one of the pioneers of the Klondike region, and represented Harper's Weekly and the London Chronicle as special correspondent. There are nearly one hundred and fifty excellent photographic views embodied in the book. Many of these pictures are panoramic inserts. The text is in no way unique, except in that it brings Klondike matters down to date; but the pictures are distinctly unique. The book is easily the handsomest account of gold mining in the North that has yet been published. Harper & Bros., New York. W. J. NEIDIG.

NEW YORK.

The Last of the Easter Parade.

LONDON.

Social Chatter from the British Metropolis.

NEW YORK.

ONE reason why we Americans have no stable and enduring institutions is our national habit of running things into the ground. As soon as anything rises to the dignity of a settled institution, an assured fact, it becomes a craze. Everybody takes it up; all the world pursues it, and it falls by its own weight. We pet and embrace and laud our heroes beyond all human reason, and then swing to the other extreme and render them unpopular through our very disgust at our own lack of moderation. Dewey is the most glaring example; Hobson is a case in point. We plough through a fashion in a year, and leave it to the great unrecognized, while the elect rush to new things because the fashion of last year has become so common that there is no distinction in following it.

A view of the annual Easter parade on Fifth avenue is the inspiration for this pessimistic reflection. Once, the church parade on Easter day was an occasion for the display of all New York's fashionables in their new spring clothes. It was copied from the London church parade in Hyde Park, a custom which has been as long as the memory of London and which bids fair to last as long as there are churches in England. It was about ten years ago when the newspapers first became aware of the practice and "made mention" of it in the society columns. Then, for a few years it flourished. It was the thing to walk to church on Easter day, instead of calling out your carriage. The fashionables paraded; the populace lined the curb to look on. After that, those who were not in society but desired to be regarded as high in the Four Hundred began to participate. The craze became a fever and was followed by a rapid decline. Two years ago, when the Tenderloin began to take part, the doom of the institution was sealed. But even then, the newspapers kept up the pleasant fiction; it made good copy, it was the excuse for pages and pages in the Easter supplements. Only this year did the public waken to the fact that the Easter parade, in so far as it has to do with society, is over and past.

There was a parade this year, and a big one, but few of the paraders were on churchgoing bent and none of them were of the Four Hundred. The members of the Smart Set and the Silly Set and the Clever Set and all the other companies in the regiment of society went to church as usual, because staying away from church is not respectable in New York, but they drove in their carriages and entered by the side doors and took every other precaution to avoid attention—even going so far as to be very, very quiet about their Easter clothes. The crowd on the sidewalk was a curious mixture. Respectable bourgeoise people who were really there for church-going purposes elbowed young clerks in hand-me-down frock clothes who were out as spectators. Here was a sprinkling of the Hackensack "jay," beloved of the comic weekly; there was more than a sprinkling of folk from the tenderloin, gotten up in flamboyant dress. These would-be fashionables paraded and paraded. They stopped to stare, open-mouthed, at the Dewey arch; they glared curiously at one another; they gathered in knots to witness the rapid passage of a "sure-enough Four Hundreder." All the elements which make up middle class New York were represented, but the upper crust was missing.

In their scorn of Easter display, the smart set even refrained from wearing any specially new or striking clothes. They went in gowns as sober as their church manners. There were, however, a few striking and beautiful costumes among the many atrocities on the street. But, in the main, we who study the fashions have been obliged to resort, this Eastertide, to the milliners and modistes themselves. First, as to hats, which are leading features of a fashionable Easter. This year's crop is severely plain in trimming, which is a blessing. They come in tulle, crinoline and chiffon, and also in straw as delicate as any of the three materials mentioned. There is an inclination in Paris to turn the rather broad shapes straight up in front off the face, but this is not by any means a style to be universally followed, as the brim dipping down in front or raised at the side is quite as popular and much more becoming to many faces. Most of the brims are pressed down closely to the head at the back, giving that short, cut-off appearance at the sides which is so essential. Crowns of leaves and brims of flowers form the decoration of the daintiest of toques, and one of the very newest millinery items is presented in dyed skeleton leaves lightly stitched over with sequins. These are used in place of the abused quill.

In the parade crowd itself, I noted that gray was the favorite tint for the gowns—gray in every shade and variation. Two thirds of the gowns which could be really called smart were of this color. A trim figure and dark face looked roguishly demure in the setting of a light gray cloth gown with an Eton jacket of the same set off by stitched white satin revers over a cherry silk bodice. The picture was topped by a coquettish sailor of cherry straw, with great bunches of cherries that looked as though they had been plucked from an orchard in June. Then there was a dark gray gown, cut in the same fashion, worn with a toque made all of folds of lavender chiffon, and a lavender silk bodice. Yet another maid in gray, with just enough of the tailor stamp about her for trimness and enough of the Mademoiselle Fluffy for coquetry, wore a dainty turban of pink straw, with broad soft velvet bows to reduce its agressiveness. There were gray with pale blue, gray with rose, gray with gold, and even gray with black and white.

Black ranked next in claim for attention. A famous artist has said that black is the most brilliant of colors in relief. Many a girl and matron emphasized that chromatic truth by her costume yesterday. Black tailor gowns with old lace appliqued upon revers and cuffs and wide collars, black turbans and toques, with a rose or two or a bunch of violets, brought the sombre color into strong relief.

The prettiest girl of the thousands of pretty girls on the avenue wore a black braided gown over a white silk waist, a big picture hat, heavy with black plumes, and a bunch of violets that measured sixteen inches. The well-groomed young man who walked beside her had undoubtedly presented them. There were black gowns with pink hats, with lavender, with white, with red and with blue hats.

LONDON.

WAR! war! war! It is the one subject of conversation these days. If there be a story to tell, it is on, of, or about one of the generals that are now fighting. There will be but little in the festivity way this year owing to the numbers of people who are in mourning. Mourning for a soldier who dies far away is quite different from mourning for one who has passed into the other land at home. For the first, one assumes a heroic sort of grief. He is, as a rule, young and a bright future lies before him, and always a hero. To die the death of a hero or martyr fighting for his country is a glorious end. It is a terrible sight to watch the anxious fathers and mothers at the War Office waiting for news of their dear ones. Most of them are too weak from worry to know when the name they dread to hear is added to the killed. Once in a while however, one sees a woman turn white and walk away and the look in her eye, quite dry but cold and cheerless in its aspect, one feels her husband's name was in the list. Lord Roberts, "Bobs" as he is called is the most popular man on the field. Kitchener, Warren, and Buller however, are greatly respected and the people expect them to do great things. Rather a good story is told on Sir Charles Warren, who feels the necessity of a morning bath so tremendously that under no circumstances, no matter how trying will he do without it. On the last occasion of Buller to cross the Tugela it was impossible for Warren to leave his post. Beneath the fire of the Boers in the open battlefield with the absolute sangfroid that differentiates Englishmen from all others, he took his morning tub. Just at that moment Buller wished to confer with Warren. It was quite impossible for Sir Charles to move, so Buller had to ride across the impromptu bathroom, where the two generals conversed on matters of minute importance—one on horseback the other in his tub.

It was rather a surprise even to the Royal household, that the Queen contemplated a visit to Ireland. It had been a particularly frigid morning when Lord Lansdowne remarked to Her Majesty that she would perhaps find the weather warmer in Italy.

"I am not going to Italy, but to Ireland this year. My Irish subjects and I need to see one another again." It is quite remarkable that the Queen's memory is still so perfect. She can remember the most minute details of state affairs and ceremonies, even the relations that exist between her friends. More curious still is her faculty for recollecting the pose or idiosyncrasy of the different literary or artistic people who have been presented to her. The youngest child of the Duke and Duchess of York, being a boy, will be christened Patrick. Had a girl appeared she was to be Princess Hibernia. It is easy to see the fuss the Irish would have made about her.

Mrs. Asquith and her amateur theatrical company quite surprised society by the rendering of "Forget-me-not." Mrs. Asquith played the grande dame as a grande dame. She is forceful, with the magnetism of a genuine personality, and quite brought back the time when Mrs. Patrick Campbell was the greatest of English amateurs previous to her adopting the stage as a profession. In the last act, Mrs. Asquith wore a gown of a pinkish mauve panne. The front was of real lace embroidered with raised sprays of orchids daintily wrought in shades of mauve chiffon. Mrs. Asquith wore her famous pearls. Speaking of Mrs. Patrick Campbell, it is sad to hear, of the death of her husband just when he was achieving fame, owing to his bravery. He was a splendid sportsman, could shoot and ride and a great deal was expected of him when he volunteered in the Imperial Yeomanry, but death, alas, has too soon rendered futile the hopes that were centered upon him. The Campbells, who were an interesting pair, fell in love and ran away to be married when she was 17, and he two years older. After finding it somewhat difficult to earn a good living in England, he started out to the Cape. During his absence, Mrs. Campbell went into the theatrical world and won fame first as "The Second Mrs. Tanqueray." Not only fame but recognition in the substantial form of hard cash. She wrote to her husband, who, was in Beira, a dreary pestilential hole surrounded by swamps, acquainting him of her good fortune, sending him money and begging him to return home. Being an independent man, Campbell would not live on his wife's earnings. He was at the time larder provider to the principal hotel of the place. Later on he returned to England, but when war broke out was a volunteer. Mrs. Campbell will, I believe, visit the United States early next year.

With the deaths of Steveens and Artemus Ward we miss two of the greatest writers of the day. Artemus Ward was the man who brought war corresponding down to a fine art. He acquired a knowledge of soldiering in the ranks, and with his tremendous daring and unfailing energy he could give one the throbbing and terrible sensation of the battlefield. He was perhaps incapable of attaining the brilliancy of style of Steevens, but it was through his wonderful descriptive ability so many of us have felt the power, glory and honor of war. He was fortunate in securing a devoted and kind wife. She was in her day one of the reigning belles in Washington. When her engagement to Artemus Ward was announced, it is said many of the leading young men who were in love with her changed the whole tenor of their lives. He had been in ill health for many years owing to hard campaigning.

AT THE THEATERS

James Neill, it is said, does not aspire to the title of a great actor; he only claims that he is the most versatile leading man in the business and as such the one best suited to stock company work. He has proved his claim in San Francisco. We have had him in a Sol Smith Russell part, a Maurice Barrymore part, a Nat Goodwin part, and next week he is to give Mansfield a go. In no single one of these roles has he approached the original creator, but in each one he has given an intelligent and acceptable performance. The company is from fair to middling. The stage management is excellent in every way. The scenery and accessories are tasteful. These excellencies, added to the merit of the star, make the present engagement at the California the best theatrical money's worth we have had in San Francisco for many months. The chief defect in Mr. Neill's acting is his lack of magnetism, which is a fault inseparable from great range of abilities. An actor who can play in the dashing Sothern style one week and in the subtle Mansfield manner another must sink his own personality under so many layers of artifice that there is little chance for the spontaneity which gives magnetism.

In "The Gilded Fool," a comparison between Neill and Nat Goodwin leaves the younger man far behind at the outset. The episode of the Fool's rising after a wild night, is with Mr. Neill of little more importance than the dialogue between surbordinates which precedes with it, Mr. Goodwin it is probably the piece of business that is kept longest in one's memory of play. Goodwin is rollickingly funny, Neill is merely very tall and very thick of utterence. In fact, the impression he makes all through the first act is a vague one. But in the second, he comes out forcibly and leaves Goodwin behind in this stretch; here there is a buoyancy, a vigorous boyishness about Mr. Neill that Goodwin cannot assume with all his humor. This is Mr. Neill's best act. He is sincere through all, but in none of the more melodramatic passages is he as interesting as in these bursts of young enthusiasm. The business is farcical, but it is well done.

Miss Chapman is a tall young woman who carries an impossible head of hair, and whose delivery has a range of about three notes in pitch. In spite of these distractions she was very womanly at times, and at the last of the play carried her scene charmingly. Miss Julia Dean is a clever ingenue, fresh, original, and clear-cut. In this play she is a terrible example to certain young ladies who wear two thirds of their hair over the left eye. Even Miss Dean's cleverness could not make her love scenes convincing with that coiffure.

The voice of Mr. Ben Howard is a delight, making the other voices on the stage thick and muffled by comparison. It is crisp, beautifully moderated with never a tone of the melodramatic, although the role gives all a villian's temptations. His impersonation of the bad brokerman is one of the best things in the performance.

Etta Butler, with her imitations, is the star feature of the Orpheum bill. Her mimicry is undoubtedly clever, but she shows a tendency to overimpersonation, which is, at times, a serious defect. San Franciscans are hardly able to judge of the most of it, because Miss Butler imitates only the reigning stage favorites of New York and it has been a long, long time since any of them have been on the play-forsaken Pacific Coast. The imitation of Mrs. Fiske as "Becky Sharp" is, perhaps, her best act. The Forrests are clowns with one new feature, and dozens of "gags" as old as the theatre. There are three "sketch teams." Rae and Brosche are very bad knockabout people. Buoman and Adelle, on the other hand, are clever and amusing. The man of the team is a genuine comedian. Mr. and Mrs. Sidman have a sketch reminiscent of the "Old Homestead." Sidman's Down-East accent is even more accurate and subtly humorous than that of Denman Thompson. Little Fred's trained animals go at their work with enthusiasm. The football game, which ends their act, is amusing from the joy with which the dogs enter into the sport.

At the Orpheum, the Fulgora Company will enter on its second and last week with an entire change of bill, and Etta Butler will give a number of new imitations. The rest of the bill is entirely new. Milton and Dollie Nobles will present Mr. Nobles' latest comedietta, "A Blue Grass Widow." Neither the actor-author or his wife need any introduction in San Francisco. Mark Sullivan is a young monologist recently risen to prominence in the Eastern country. W. E. Bates is a cornet soloist. The Biograph returns with entirely new views, most of them representing present events in South Africa. There will also be a number of the campaign in the Philippines. The holdovers are: Little Fred and his wonderful performing animals; Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Sidman, who will present "Back Home," a sequence to the piece they are playing this week; Buoman and Adelle; Brothers Forrest and Etta Butler.

Yale's big spectacular production "The Evil Eye" is to be the attraction at the Columbia Theatre for two weeks beginning with next Monday night. Three cars are utilized for the transportation of the trick mechanical effects, scenery and costumes. The celebrated German comedian Al. H. Wilson, Rosaire and Elliott the pantomimists; and the Phasey Troupe are with the company. The story tells of the Man Merry Mishaps of Hid and the Weird Wonderful Wanderings of Ned.

Paloma Schramm, the child pianist and composer, well known in San Francisco, will give two concerts at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s Hall, next Wednesday and Friday afternoons, May 9th and 12th. She will be assisted by her little sister Karla. Seats will be on sale at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s.

At the California Theatre next week the Neill Company will present, by special permission of Richard Mansfield, "A Parisian Romance," Octave Feuillet's powerful romantic play. Mr. James Neill will appear as the "Baron Chevrial." Matinees are given Thursday and Saturday.

Next week at the Alcazar, Alfried and Wheeler's sensational melodrama, "The Great Diamond Robbery," is to be the bill. There will be a new and elaborate stage dressing, a large cast, and many new people in the supernumerary roles.

John Drew and his company have started West and will play two or three cities before their arrival here. They are in Cleveland this week presenting "The Tyranny of Tears."

SCIENCE WINS OUT.

"UNDOUBTEDLY the first man to recognize the true value of placed hits," said the man with the crooked fingers as he banked the forge fire, "was the manager of the team with which I made my first professional appearance. Our proficiency in that line was the result of hours of practice, but it paid, and when I think of it as the means of retiring from the game one of the greatest outfielders and dirtiest players in the profession, I consider it time well spent.

"It was early in the eighties and I had been playing for a season or two with semi-professional teams. I finally caught on with one of the clubs in a small league down in Pennsylvania, being signed to catch. When the contract was sent to me there came an order with it to report about two months before the opening of the season. That struck me as unusual, but I was anxious to break into the game professionally, so about the first of March I reported. I was the last man on the ground, being the only newcomer, and when I stepped off the train there was the manager waiting for me. As we walked up the street he asked whether I had brought a uniform and, seeing that I was surprised, he said:

"'You might as well understand now that my team is run strictly on scientific principles. There is never a play made that hasn't been all planned out, and that's why you were ordered to report here so early. All the other men are last year's players. We dropped the catcher because he slipped up on a triple play trick that we had practised for three months. I just tell you this so that you will know what's expected of you. Hurry over to the hotel, get on a uniform of some sort and come down to the training quarters.'

"Now, I'll leave it to you if that wasn't a pretty fierce game to steer a young player against, and I did a whole lot of thinking while I changed my clothes. The more I thought it over the poorer seemed my chances of holding down the job. But I was there, and I had no coin and little prospect of getting any except from the manager of the team. I finally made up my mind that I was there to make a pretty good bluff, at any rate, and when I came down to the hotel office and asked the clerk to direct me to the training grounds I was beginning to recover my nerve. The clerk looked me over, nodded his head and then asked whether I was the new catcher for the team. I told him I was, and he said:

"'The manager's a queer sort of chap, too blamed scientific to my way of thinking, but he took a lot of raws last season and made them pennant winners, and if a man has the game in him why Mike'll bring it out. Can you hit?'

"I was strong at that game and when I told him my average he allowed that I would be all right, if I followed instructions and called science to my assistance. The training quarters were in a roller skating rink, giving plenty of room for batting practice, and when I walked in the team was at work with the stick. What I saw surprised me more than a foul tip on a split finger. Way down at the far end of the rink was a half-dozen 18-inch squares chalked out on the floor, and up near the entrance was a bunch of the players batting. It was 300 feet, if it was an inch, from where they stood to the squares. But they just laced the ball into those squares, apparently without an effort, and as I was rubbing my eyes to make sure I was awake the manager throws a fearful roast into one of the men because he happens to strike the line. Then he saw me and walked over, shook hands, called the rest of the gang over and introduced me and then handed me a club. One of the pitchers shot up a nice one and I copped it square. The ball goes on a line near the top of the rink and pushes out a window. I looked to see what the manager thought of the hit and saw him rubbing his chin.

"'You hit 'em hard enough,' says he, 'but you need training. If that hit had been made by a scientific batter it would probably have gone further. It's where the ball lands that counts, even if it is just out of reach instead of over the fence. But you'll learn, and I guess you can draw on the club for a little money.'

"Well, the rest of that morning I put in watching the other players at work. The way they dropped a ball just where they wanted was something wonderful. Next morning my training began. For two hours I just practiced swinging a bat, and when we stopped work for the morning the manager assured me that inside of a month I would be an average place hitter. That was encouraging, and in the afternoon I worked like a Turk, so that when we stopped for the day I was was assured that I should have a crack at the ball next day. They did as they had promised and set me at trying to drive the ball into a space about the size of a piano box. By noon I could get it there pretty accurately, batting fungo, and in the afternoon I had the ball pitched to me. That was harder work, and I felt discouraged at my failure to land the ball right and the manager gave me a call for carelessness. I braced up then and by the end of the week they had made my box a quarter smaller.

"By the time I had reached the 18-inch box stage it had become evident that I would make the team. After six weeks I was pronounced all right on long-distance batting, and then began the practice of short hits. The great aim in this branch of the work was to get the ball just out of reach, for, as the manager said: 'Get 'em anywhere near a man and he goes after 'em. If he jumps for a high one he may strain a cord or when he comes down may turn his ankle. If you're going to play scientific ball you must figure on all these things.'

"Things ran along in this way until the opening of the season, and when we played the first game on the home grounds the place was jammed. We won that game just by placed hits and the local papers handed us all sorts of bouquets, so that we began to grow a bit chesty. But the manager was there to call us, and we steadied down. We made a runaway race of it for the first month and the attendance when we played fell off, as people grew tired of seeing one team win all the time. We grew careless and lost a number of games, and the first thing we knew were fifth instead of first. To make matters worse, when we were practising one morning on the home grounds our left fielder, one of the best men on the team, was stung by a hornet on the eye, putting him out of the game. The hornet came from a big nest in the corner of the fence and we were for burning the things out some night. The manager wouldn't hear of it, but warned us to keep away and not disturb them, and then we knew that there was a real warm time in prospect for some one. It was in the second series of home games that we learned who was to be the victim.

"It seemed that the catcher, who had been released the season before, had caught on with one of the other terms in the league and had put them next to a lot of our tricks. He was playing left field and would tip off our plays to the other men, so that it was only by the hardest kind of work that we managed to win one game out of the three on his team's grounds. When we came to our town we were there to get back and when he crippled one of our men by spiking him in the leg we had all the more reason for wanting to do business with him. There was but one game of the home series left, and we were desperate. We had tried to pick a fight with him on the grounds, but that wouldn't work, and his manager kept him in nights after the games.

"The morning before the last game we had a long talk with the manager, and when he said that he had it all fixed we were crazy to know the game, but he refused to tip us off until the time to turn the trick. During our batting practice that morning he fastened up a big bunch of rags over in the corner of the fence in right field and kept me plugging away at it. It wasn't such a big hit for me, and after a few trials I had it down pat; could nail the bunch every time. Then he asked me if I could do the same thing in left. I said 'Yes,' and called to the pitcher to shoot one up until I plastered the hornets' nest. I never sat down so suddenly in all my life, and when I turned to ask the manager what he meant by pulling my legs out from under me, he said:

"'Do you want to queer the whole game? Why, I should think that you could see what I wanted. Here I've had you batting at the fence corner for two hours and you don't see that that's the way we expect to put that guy out of the game! Maybe you think I had that hornets' nest left up for fun? Well, you've got another think. If you don't push the ball right into that bunch of winged fire this afternoon, you ought to quit the game. You can do it, if you try, and we'll put a stop to dirty ball by other people.'

"That game I'll remember after I've forgotten everything else. For six innings neither side scored, and in the seventh they run in five on us. Our manager was having forty kind of fits, and the way he jabbed the assegai into us when we came to the bench was frightful. In our half of the seventh we made two runs, leaving us three to the bad. It was one-two, three with the other side in the eighth, and then we came in to win the game. After two were out a little single and a couple of passes filled the bases, and it was up to me. I looked out at that guy in left field and saw him grin. That settled it. Two strikes were called and twice I fouled the ball into deep left, to get Mr. Dirty Ballplayer to move out and play deep. Then I got it just where I wanted it and punched it straight out over his head.

"He saw that it was going back of him and turned and ran with the ball. It was a great race, but the ball reached first. Smash it went into the hornets' nest like a shell from a six-inch gun. Just as it struck, Mr. Dirty Ball was about six feet back, running like a deer and unable to stop himself. He saw the fence and threw up his hands to break the force of the collision. What the ball didn't do his hands did. The fiercest and wildest war dance ever executed was tame to his. I tore around the bases and then lay down on the ground and howled.

"The other players thought he had a fit and rushed over to him, and then they danced. The crowd was on, and how they yelled! I had seen enthusiastic people at a ball game before, but never a crowd like that. There was that bunch of out-of-town players fighting the hornets, while the umpire was trying to get the game to go on, the crowd was cheering at the way the dirty player had got what had been coming to him for some time, and our manager was promising to raise my pay and then shouting: 'What did I tell you about scientific ball? Do you think that any ordinary person could have placed a hit like that? Never! Such a feat was possible only for a man trained by me. Hurry up there and get the game going!'

"But the battle with the hornets had crippled the members of the other team to such an extent that they couldn't finish, and of course we won. Mr. Dirty Player was in the hospital for about three weeks, and when he came out was the sickest looking wreck you ever saw. He wanted to try and square himself with us, but we wouldn't stand for it, and the last we heard of him he was holding down a job as ground-keeper out West. It was pretty hard luck, but he started it, and people who undertake to interfere with the development of science, even in baseball, must be checked."

A MATTER OF TEMPERAMENT.—In English journalism, short-hand reports of political meetings are much more important than in America. The Liverpool Post once sent a reporter, not a strict teetotaler, to report a campaign rally at Dublin. The programme was carried out up to the point of the return of the reporter to the office, where he arrived in a most business-like condition and sober as a judge. But when he sat down to his work and attempted to write out, not a line could he make sense of. The editor was in despair. One of his sons came to his assistance, but it was of no avail. At last, this young man had a brilliant idea, and broached it to his father. He said, "It's quite clear that Simon was tipsy when he took the speech. It's quite clear that he will never be able to write it out. Things cannot be worse than they are. What if I take him out on the spot and make him tipsy again?" It was the last resort. Away they went. The desired temperament was speedily produced, and when the veteran reporter came back, thick in his voice and apparently by no means clear in his ideas, he wrote out the whole of the speech without the slightest difficulty.

DARKEY GOOD NATURE.—Just before dawn on the night after the battle of El Caney, a part of the 25th (colored) Infantry was filing past General Lawton's roadside headquarters. By the light of his camp-fire, the General noted that one big corporal was carrying, in addition to his own equipment, the gun and trappings of a wounded comrade who limped beside him. Besides this, he was bent under the weight of a big, black dog, the company mascot. "Here, Corporal," said Lawton, "didn't you march all last night?" "Yessah," said the corporal, trying to salute. "And didn't you fight all day?" "Yessah." "And haven't you marched since ten o'clock tonight?" "Yessah." "Well, then, what in blazes are you carrying that dog for?" "Why, boss," said the corporal, as he shifted the beast from one shoulder to the other, "the dog's tired!"

x

A REMARKABLE CHANGE.—Frankfort Moore, the English journalist and author, was once approached by a timid little woman, who explained that she wished to interview him. She added that this was her first detail and she proved by her first few questions that she was entirely inadequate to the task. Taking pity upon her, Moore sat down and wrote a racy and interesting interview with himself. Moore met the city editor of the lady's paper a few months later. "Do you know," said the editor, "I think that you must have a wonderfully interesting personality?" "And why so, pray?" "I sent a new reporter to interview you a while ago. The story she turned out was capital, but she has never come anywhere near it since!"

x

A SMALL SALARY.—George Harvey, editor of the North American Review, is regenerating the publishing house of Harper. Shortly after he took hold of the business, Harvey said to the senior member of the firm: "There are too many of the Harper family drawing large salaries out of the business. Until we get the business on a sound footing, I shall expect that no one is to draw more out of it than I myself." "That is a good idea," said Mr. Harper, "How much do you expect to draw?" "Nothing at all," responded Harvey.

THE POWER OF EXAMPLE.—Rev. Dr. Clark, best-liked chaplain in the British army, gained his popularity in this wise:—It was in the Zulu war, and a detachment of British soldiers were defending their camp against a native impi. Ammunition was low, the enemy were swarming on all sides, and it began to look like a forlorn hope, wherefore the men began cursing roundly. The "swear words" came to the chaplain's ears, and he rushed along the line, shouting: "Don't swear, men, don't swear, don't swear—shoot the——s!"

x

A SLIGHT SHRINKAGE.—A Cincinnatti man, having bought some red flannel shirts which were guaranteed in every respect, came into the place of purchase after a fortnight and complained that the article was not what it was said to be. "Why not?" asked the clerk, "have they faded or shrunk?" "Faded! shrunk! Young man, when I came down to breakfast with one of them on, my wife asked me, 'What are you wearing my pink coral necklace around your throat for?'"

x

TWO MISFITS.—Sir James Paget was once waiting in a hatter's shop while his silk tile was being ironed, when an excited individual rushed in and, mistaking him for the proprietor, began to register a lively "kick"—"Do you see this hat? Well it doesn't fit, I tell you it doesn't fit!" The baronet looked him over very quietly, and answered: "Well, now that you call my attention to it, your coat does not fit very well, either."

EVENTS CURRENT.

Roberts Advances on Transvaal.

Lord Roberts has advanced at last Driving the scattered Boer forces before him, he is moving on toward the Transvaal with the main body of his army. His cavalry and skirmishers have cleared away the dangerous Boer force at Thebanchu, and routed several inferior bodies at points along the front. The British scouts are now operating nearly a hundred miles beyond Bloemfontein. In the early part of the movement, the burghers interposed only a very spiritless resistance. But on Tuesday, General Hutton, leading the advance cavalry, was checked while operating along the Zand river and attempting to capture a Boer convoy. He was led into an ambush and forced to give way and retreat for several miles in order to save his troops. It seems likely that the British are nearing the points where Botha and the Boers under his command will solidify and hold themselves ready for active resistance. The languid fighting by which they opposed Roberts' advance from Bloemfontein thus far is only part of their tactics. They have never sought to oppose the British seriously in the Free State, but only to hinder them as long as possible. Now, however, Roberts is approaching Transvaal and the true seat of the war. It is now known that Roberts' delay was caused by lack of transport more than by any other one thing. His horses and mules have been dying at the rate of thousands a week, the climate being fatal to all unseasoned animals. Hardly a beast which was with the British army when it landed at the Cape is now alive. Part of the difficulty is to be obviated by the use of traction engines on the level space between Bloemfontein and the border. The Transvaal Volksraad has reopened, the delegates coming in from the front to attend its sessions. Ten of the body have died in this war, and many others carry wounds. In opening the body, Kruger made his accustomed bitter complaint of the English and added some charges of murdering the wounded and ill-treating prisoners. It is said that the body is by no means unanimous or the war question. A strong faction is for opening peace negotiations on a basis which is said to be extremely distasteful to Kruger and Leyds. In England, the popular feeling is one of almost superstitious reliance on Roberts, the one general who has shown the ability to meet new conditions with new tactics.

The Philippine War.

Last week, this department had Aguinaldo dead or missing. Now it appears that the Filipino leader is very much alive and is as mischievous as ever. General Young, who came so near to laying hands on him in the chase of last winter, reports that he has rejoined the forces of the insurgent general, Tino, in the north and that they have assembled a considerable force in the mountains. Young is certain that Aguinaldo is preparing to do battle and asks for reinforcements. From all quarters come reports which indicate that the insurrection is still active. In Panay, in Leyte, in Samur, there have been scattering attacks on American garrisons. In Bulan, South Luzon, they drove out a small American garrison and sacked the town, killing a great many Spanish and Chinese. On the other hand, the rebels have lost one of their ablest leaders. General Pantelon Garcia, the highest insurgent officer except Aguinaldo, has been captured by Lieutenant E. P. Smith of General Funston's staff in the town of Jaen, three miles northeast of San Isidro, province of New Ecija. Spies reported that Garcia was sick and had been compelled to hide there, and Lieutenant Day and forty cavalry surrounded the town. The spies led them directly to the house where Garcia was disguised as a peasant. Garcia commanded all the insurgents in Central Luzon, several generals, including Pio del Pilar and Mescardo, being under him. Otis has gone at last, and the whole American army of the Philippines breathes free once more. His expressed opinion that organized rebellion is over is opposed by a late article in Leslie's, the work of Edwin Wildman, former vice-consul at Hongkong, known to fame as "the man who armed Aguinaldo." He is probably as extreme on his side as is Otis; the truth may lie between them. He says: "Although General Otis would have us believe that the war in the Philippines is over, I learn from private sources of information of the highest authority that there exists a veritable reign of terror in most parts of the archipelago within a gunshot of our army posts. Aguinaldo's forces have scattered into marauding bands, and leaguing themselves with the mountain Tulisanes and Ladrones, terrorize the country and effectually check the cultivation of crops and the sale of marketable products. The few ports that have been obtained, have shipped away what little supplies they contained, and the tons upon tons of hemp, sugar and rice that are stored in the interior are beyond the reach of buyers. The money paid for the thousands of bales of hemp shipped from garrisoned ports has found its way into insurgent coffers, and the revolutionary juntas at Hongkong and Singapore are making extensive purchases of arms, preparatory to a renewed season of filibustering and general hostilities as soon as the rainy season is over. Our army is busy protecting its posts while the insurgents carry on their operations in the interior and paralyze agriculture and trade. Scattered bands of armed insurgents wage war against all who hesitate to acknowledge the Aguinaldo government, and the inhabitants are in a state of terror that prevents honest industry or open alliance with American sovereignty. The American troops make short work of these robbers, but our garrisons are so far apart and so few in numbers that they invariably are obliged to fall back to a seaport town, where they can get supplies from Manila, for the insurgents have so thoroughly ravaged the country that it is impossible to supply even a small battalion with native products. If we ever hope to put an end to this Indian warefare we must send additional forces to the islands. Our present corps is totally inadequate to cope with the situation and bring the war to a close. The islands, commercially or otherwise, will be utterly useless until life and property are made safe."

The Basutos and the Transvaal War.

"The most disagreeable feature of the latest news from South Africa is the uneasiness of the Basutos." This was the comment made a few days ago by Mr. Spenser Wilkinson, one of the greatest and best military experts of England. The Basutos inhabit the northeastern portion of Cape Colony, occupying an irregular, oval-shaped country, comprising about 10,293 square miles. The country is fertile and productive, with a delightful climate. No whites are allowed to inhabit the region, so that the country remains just as it was two hundred years ago, when the tribe was first discovered. The population of Basutoland numbers about 218,000. They are an agglomerated race, being composed of several tribes that have fused together in comparitively recent times. Like many mixed races, they are stronger, bolder and more warlike and active than any of the branches from which they sprung. While they are nominally under British rule, at no time have the British authorities ever felt sure of their allegiance to the crown. Time and time again the Basutos have risen in open revolt, and their chiefs still retain almost absolute authority, and in their "pitusus" or parliaments no consideration of the British crown is taken, whatsoever. The recent trouble in South Africa has stirred up these people, who are ever willing to engage in war, and should they come to the conclusion that England is suffering at the hands of the Boers, it is feared that they would soon throw off their allegiance to Great Britain and take up arms with the burhgers. By blood, however, they are akin to the Kaffirs, who have borne much at the hands of Kruger's people, and there is a possibility that a certain strong pro-British element may gain control and turn them against the Boers. The difference is this; the Boers, in their extremity, would be likely to avail themselves of the assistance of the blacks, while Great Britain, sure of ultimate success, fears, and with good reason, to bear before Europe the responsibility of turning savage warfare upon white people.

Premier Salisbury Commits an Indiscretion.

Lord Salisbury, the British premier, who enjoys the distinction of being the most indiscreet among the English statesmen, has made an exhibition of himself again. His speech at the opening of the Primrose League on May 9 has startled all England, shocked his own party and overjoyed the opposition. The Tory papers are making no comment, while the Liberal organs denounce it in unmeasured terms. The head and front of his offending was a tactless and offensive paragraph concerning the Irish Nationalists. Coming just at this time, when all England, from the Queen down, is disposed to be friendly to the Irish, when the Transvaal War is being made the excuse for bridging the gulf between the two races, it seems all the more inexcusable even to the Tory party. This is the offending clause in full: "Mr. Gladstone, in an evil moment for the fame of the country and for his party, attached himself to the idea of the separation of England and Ireland. No one can say the home rule cause presents any element of sanguine anticipation for the future. I am assured that there is no hope of the predominant party ever giving to Ireland practical independence. We have learned something from the South African war—how that loyal government, in spite of warnings, could accumulate armaments against the most powerful combatant and thus secure a terrible advantage. We now know better than we did ten years ago what a risk it would be if we gave a disloyal government in Ireland the power of accumulating forces against this countrol." The Daily Express voices the general sentiment in England when it declared that Salisbury is one of those indiscretions which, as Lord Beaconsfield said, may be apologized for but can never be explained. The paper adds that the maladroitness of his sentences is regrettable in every way. After recalling the services of the Irish in South Africa and the Queen's reception in Ireland, the paper asks if it is the right moment to fling, even by the awkwardness of a phrase, the insult of comparison with the rebel Dutch in the face of Irishmen and says emphatically that it is not. It adds that Salisbury has rarely made a worse mistake than in raising the buried question of Irish disaffection at this moment, when the feud of centuries seems buried for good and the kindly trustfulness of the Queen had disarmed the last garrison of rebel feeling in the sister land.

A New Factor in Naval Warfare.

The Holland submarine boat, recently purchased by the United States government, has introduced an entirely new element in naval warfare. Boats of this kind have been under consideration, both in England and France, for ten years past. The French have adapted a form of their own, whose exact features are not fully known, owing to the secrecy with which military and naval secrets are guarded in France; England has invariably rejected the plans. Mr. Holland, the inventor, has been perfecting his plans and urging them upon our government for several years. The Holland is shaped like a sweet potato, is 53 feet 4 inches long and 10 feet 3 inches in diameter at the broadest part. When cruising about one-eighth of her bulk would be above the surface, and she would draw about eight feet of water. She can be wholly submerged and yet operate in a depth of twelve feet. Propulsion is effected by a screw that derives its power from a gasoline engine when the boat is running at the surface. When she is submerged the screw is driven by an electric motor and storage battery. This battery would be previously charged by the boat's own engines. One charge of the battery ought to enable her to run seventy-five miles under water. When submerged her speed would not exceed four or five knots. When cruising she can travel a little faster. She has made a speed of seven or eight knots on the surface. The Holland has two rudders, a vertical and a lateral one. By combining these, the vessel may be made to sail at any angle and in any direction desired. For breathing under the water, the men are supplied with compressed air. This latter day dream of Jules Verne's Nautilus is designed to carry three Whitehead projectiles, twelve feet long and sixteen inches in diameter. The boat also has what is called an "air gun." Its object is to throw into the air a projectile containing high explosives. The fact that the vessel can run under water adds greatly to her aggressive power, as she is not only theoretically, but practically, invisible, a thing which cannot be said of any other torpedo boat known. This new destroyer is intended only for harbor and coast defense, and cannot navigate deep water.

Large Frauds in Cuba.

The unsettled condition of governmen in Cuba and the necessity of some permanent form of control is recalled by a discovery of great and extensive frauds practiced in the postoffice system of the island by one Chas. F. Neely, an employe high in the Havana postoffice. The shortage may yet reach a million dollars. It goes without saying that such an extensive fraud could never have been perpetrated in the postoffice system of the United States proper, because it would have been discovered long before it had mounted to that sum. It was first suspected when, last month, the inspectors found a shortage of $12,000 in the whole island. This was, however, set down to errors in balances, and nothing was done. But the following month the shortage was noticed. It was then discovered that, although Cuba was evidently doing more postal business than ever before, receipts for each month of this year were less than for any corresponding month of last year. Suspicion pointed to Neely; he was arrested and figures went up at once. The estimate of a million dollars' shortage is based upon the rise in receipts for the period since the arrest. It is believed that stamps worth $411,000 given to Neely for cancellation were not cancelled but were placed in circulation by him. It is believed that he had accomplices and that the whole system of Cuban postoffices is honeycombed with fraud. There will be a general investigation at once.

The New Army Bill.

The new army bill, just passed by the Senate, practically revolutionizes the present military system of this country. It provides that in the future, as vacancies occur in the departments of the adjutant general, the inspector general, the quartermaster general, and the commissary general, are to be filled by details from the line, and that the new appointee is not to occupy the position for a period of more than four years. The corps of engineers, medical department, pay department and judge advocate department are not to be affected by the new regulations. The new bill further states that the present regimental organization of the artillery is to be abandoned, and provides for the establishment of an artillery corps of ten branches, namely;—126 batteries of coast artillery, and 18 batteries of field artillery, with a total of 17,448. It provides that the number of cadets at West Point shall be increased by 100, ten at large from each state, and ten more from the present number of twenty from the United States at large. The commanding general of the army is to be known as the lieutenant general, while the officer now known as adjutant general is to be called major general. The primary intent of the measure is the getting rid of "algerism," the old bureau system which has been the bane of the war department. Under the new conditions, able officers may be promoted and weak ones left at a standstill in a manner which was formerly impossible. It is thought that the incompetence in high places which caused the scandals of our Spanish war will now be done away with.

White Rule in Louisiana.

Ever since the enfranchisement of the negro in the South, the complaint has been made by the native whites in that section of our country that the white man's burden has been borne for the most part by the black man, and that the Caucasian division of the population was of no account whatever, politically. Since the whites have come into control in Louisiana under the new constitution, however, it would seem that the so-called superior race is guilty of all the offenses previously ascribed to the inferior. Returns show that in the entire state, which in 1890 showed 119,815 negroes of voting age, only 5,313 were registered. Over half of the entire number of negro electors were able to read and write. In many parishes, where the negroes constitute nine-tenths of the population, the entire political control of the parish was in the hands of the whites, who constitute the remaining one-tenth. The reduction of the negro vote is not so much due to the new educational franchise, as to the complicated registration and election laws, aimed directly at the negroes, the avowed purpose of the new constitution and the new registration laws being to get rid of the negro politically. It must be admitted that the project has succeeded admirably, both Democrats and Republicans working to effect the elimination of the colored man. While the vote of Louisiana has shrunk 140,000 since 1896, one good thing may be said—from a Northern standpoint—for the recent April elections: they were the quietest and most peaceful events of their kind that have occurred since 1860.

EDITORIAL COMMENT

Useless Municipal Ownership.

HENRY WEINSTOCK, an American citizen and prominent western merchant, in a lecture delivered before an intelligent audience at the Unitarian church in Oakland, on "the purification of a city's morals," gave voice to the following emphatic opinion:

"No nation has ever failed more miserably in the conduct of its municipal affairs than has the American people. Go where we will, pick up what daily paper we may, our ears and our eyes are met with tales of municipal fraud and corruption, of the incompetency of civic officials, of gross extravagance in city expenditures."

There is nothing vague, halting, or uncertain in this declaration. It is a bold, unequivocal charge and has a ring of defiance to it that challenges contradiction.

Mr. Weinstock is not an alarmist, communist or socialist, he is merely a plain, everyday citizen with a large stock of plain everday common sense. That there is truth behind the charge quoted from his address, no one can successfully deny. American municipal politics are corrupt, you know it, your neighbors know it, we all know it. The cause lies deep below the surface, and is not to be eradiated by taking spring remedies for one season. With all our knowledge of crookedness in local municipal affairs, it would seem to be the height of folly for San Francisco to dip into new municipal "business ventures," when it has proved itself so utterly and completely incompetent to manage the matters that are purely and simply municipal.

Suppose you were a large and regular consumer of water, and that Jones was furnishing that water for you. Suppose you had it in your power to investigate and ascertain the cost of Jones' water plant; to swear witnesses and ascertain the cost of construction, the amount of operating, and fixed expenses, etc., and then, after fairly ascertaining these amounts, you had the right to fix the rates, at which Jones must furnish you water, (provided you allowed him a fair return for his money), would you, having this wide power, consider it a wise move to purchase Jones' water works, assume all the risks of droughts, accidents, extraordinary repairs, and then turn the management of such an immense undertaking over to a corrupt or corruptible city government? We think not. Would you consider it wise to take these great works out of the hands of careful economical private management and dump them into the lap of the politician who would deal out positions to his political supporters?

The rate-payer who does not go into the matter may answer, "the consumers pay interest on the water companies' debt." The answer to this is: "you will under municipal rulings pay interest on the city debt." You will pay the cost of municipal management or mismanagement which Mr. Weinstock says, and every common-sense American knows will be one of "fraud and corruption," one of "incompetency of officials," and of "gross extravagance in city expenditures."

If it is in the power of the municipality to regulate rates, if it is in its power to prevent the exacting of an exhorbitant rate and within its source to compel the enforcement of a reasonable rate, what more could it accomplish with municipal ownership? On the one hand you have all the risk and responsibility, all the debts and cost of mismanagement, and in the end, with all of this, you have only acquired the power to fix water rates. On the other hand, you have none of the risk or responsibility, none of the losses of extravagance, and you still have the power to enforce a fair rate—fair as between the consumer and the purveyor. Where is the gain through municipal ownership under these circumstances?

THE railway employes who were induced by a hostile press and private beneficial societies to reject the plan proposed by the railway Relief Bureau ought to ponder over the figures given out by the Pennsylvania Railroad.

For the month of March, 1900, the money paid out on one division is as follows:

Death benefits	$25,250 00
Accident benefits	11,111 00
Sick benefits	23,832 80

The total payments, February 15, 1886, to March 31, 1900, for the six grand divisions comprising the Pennsylvania Railroad, are:

Claims Paid	Number	Amount
Death benefits	5,518	$3,225,895 53
Accident benefits	108,912	1,435,657 56
Sick benefits	292,023	2,865,640 43
	406,453	$7,527,193 52

The answer of the skeptical employe to these figures is very likely to be "that the money was all contributed by the men, anyhow, etc., etc." The answer to such an employe is, that it would be impossible for any private associations to deal as liberally or return as much for the money. Attached to the railway relief bureau there would be no list of salaried officers, no lodge rooms officers to hire, no running expenses, and more than all of this there would be the security that the guarantee a great corporation would offer, so that a large number of deaths, decreasing membership and the like would not need to bring to the insured employe any fear as to the value of his policy.

COMMUNICATION.

The Election of Senators by the People.

YOUR editorial of April 28,1900, against the proposed amendment of the Constitution of the United States whereby United States Sentors shall be elected by direct vote of the people, fully accords with my own sentiments. You demonstrate that with political parties, as now organized,the people as a mass have little to say in choosing officers. The party organizations, Republican or Democratic, make selections for them, and if they vote at all they are compelled to support one ticket or the other, "you pays your money and takes your choice." The best, most intelligent and industrious class of people have little time to devote to the question as to whether Jones or Smith shall hold this or that office, their time is fully absorbed with the wants of their families, in their private business. There is nevertheless a class of people, some good honest and patriotic, others not so, whose whole time is occupied in political affairs,who are ambitious to secure and deal out the fat offices that are in sight.

Probably not one in a hundred of the voters in the United States know, and not one in a thousand cares, how United States Senators are elected. They only take part when an objectionable character seeks the office, or one attempts to secure it by questionable modes. While it may readily be conceded that there are none of us perfect, yet in the selection of a representative for United States Senator we want him to be a clean man at least, as that is a more laudable characteristic than wisdom or oratory, or both, without moral character.

Roger Sherman, a member of the constitutional convention, speaking of the power conferred upon the Senate,said: "The Senators, from the provision made for their appointment,will commonly be some of the most respectable citizens in the State for wisdom and probity. . . . Their being candidates for re-election will probably be one of the most powerful motions (next to that of their virtue) to fidelity in office. He also said "I can see nothing in the constitution that will lead to ita dissolution except the article for making amendments." One of our city papers of Democratic tendencies seems marvelously zealous in support of such amendment, and would lead one to believe that the idea originated with that journal, while the fact is that it has from time to time during our entire history cropped up,generally in the lower house of congress; but the wisdom and virtue of the Senate itself has been hitherto sufficient to prevent the success of this attack upon our constitution. It is now claimed by said paper that the amendment is unanimously favored except in the Senate itself. The United States Senator having been characterized by the framers of the constitution as the pillars to support it, the Senate, therefore, would hardly be expected to contribute to its overthrow by such changes as proposed. If it be a good thing to elect by direct vote United States Senators, the most important department of the government, why is it not for like reasons a good thing to elect the president of the United States and United States judges by direct vote, and thus at one blow strike down the most perfect federal union and republic the world has ever known, and, simply because legislatures of some states, or some members of them can be bribed.

The journal to which I have alluded says: "the system of Senatorial elections by Legislatures has definitely,completely and incurably broken down." How utterly absurb, ridiculous and false such a statement in the face of our long existence and progress in civilization! To still bear it out, this paper cites: "The shocking revelations of the Clark investigation, boss rule in New York, dead-lock in Pennsylvania legislature, the appointment of Quay by the Governor, the legislative contests in West Virginia, Utah and California." The instances given, assuming that the charges are true, offered the best possible vindication of the Legislature and of the wisdom of the framers of the constitution in providing that United States Senators should be elected by the Legislatures of the respective states, as they conclusively show how difficult it is for an improper man by improper means to secure the place. In the Clark case corruption seems to have been shown,and what was the result? Although Mr. Clark was elected by the Legislature of Montana, and presented himself at Washington he was not permitted by this same United States Senate to take his seat. Every member of which had been elected by the Legislature of the respective states.

As to the New York case, no corruption was shown, or attempted to be shown, nor do I preceive how a man devoid of wisdom, character and respectability can so control the Legislature of the state of New York as to secure his own and his friends,election by corruption without creating a stir in the Senate itself. Mr. Quay is charcterized as a "noted corruptionist," who created a dead-lock in the State Legislature, and received the appointment of the Governor. Well, what happened? Mr. Quay was not permitted to take his seat. That was the result in Utah, West Virginia and, lastly, California.

Here we have five states out of forty-five, whereas there was difficulty in selecting United States Senators because the Legislature could not agree upon any candidate before them. Take California and what evidence of a corrupt Legislature as a body was there shown when rather than take chances of the election of a man of alleged questionable antecedents, that body refused to caucus and adjourned without electing anyone? Could a stronger argument be adduced in favor of the existing mode for the protection of the people from being represented by one unworthy or undesirable!

In a former article by me upon this sul ject, I referred to the great difficulty in the convention of 1789 in secu[illegible] constitution at all. The convention proceeded to divi[illegible] government into three departments, the executive, the [illegible]islative and judicial,(with respect to the executive and judicial there was little controversy.) The legislative department was to consist of two branches,the first branch or house of representatives should consist of members to be elected by direct vote of the people in the several congressional districts into which the states were divided, each state to have representation in that branch in proportion to population. This conclusion was not reached until after much controversy and contention, for the reason that the mass of the population was found in but few of the states, the most of them being sparsely settled. The difficulty that seemed to be insurmountable was that when they came to the representation each state should have in the United States Senate, and how they should be chosen. It was universally conceded that the term of Senator should be different from that of member of the house, in other words a Senator should be appointed for six years while those of the house should be elected for only two years. There were but two modes of electing Senators proposed. One was that the House of Representatives should elect the Senators from a number of persons named by the respective legislatures of the several states,no one even suggested that Senators should be elected by direct vote of the people. It was finally agreed that they should be elected by the several state legislatures. The gravest and most difficult question was as to what representation each state should have in the Senate. It was contended by the larger states that the same rule sould prevail as to representation here as in the lower house, that is, in proportion to population, the smaller states contended that they in such case would always be in the minority, and would practically have no voice in the government, that each state, being soverign, should have equal voice in the Senate,a vote was taken upon a resolution to that effect,and resulted in five states voting in favor and five against the resolution, whereupon a dead-lock ensued. Then Benjamin Franklin reminded the convention that they had now reached the limit of human wisdom, and human argument, that they had failed thus far to seek light from the great father of lights,and moved that thence-forward the meetings of the convention should be opened with prayer, and that the clergy of the city should be invited to officiate. He said in effect that if they preceeded without divine light they would not succeed any better in forming a constitution than the builders of Babel. "We shall be divided by our little partial local interests, our projects will be confounded, and we ourselves shall become a reproach and a by-word down to future ages. And what is worse,mankind may hereafter, from this unfortunate instance, despair of establishing a government by human wisdom and leave it to chance, war, and conquest." The convention thereupon elected by ballot a committee consisting of one member from each state to consider the situation,and adjourned for three days. Upon meeting after adjournment, the committee reported that each state should have equal representation in the Senate. Upon this, a vote was taken; five states voted for, three against and two divided. Thus was framed the constiution under which we have lived for more than one hundred years. No amendments have been made to it since the first congress in 1789 at New York,except the 13th,14th and 15th rendered necessary by the results of the civil war.

There is no more reason for an amendment of the character proposed now than when the constitution was framed. The men who framed it had studied all the forms of government that ever existed,but found none to meet the circumstances surrounding the thirteen British colonies after they had secured their independence, "forms of government are not to be changed for light and trival causes." The people in respect to government are no wiser now than when the constitution was formed. While under it the nation has made giant strides in the acquisition of wealth,in the arts of science, education and commerce, and her flag waves over acquired territories bearing to the downtrodden of other lands the blessings of civil and righteous liberty reaching toward the highest civilization possible for human beings, we find that the people are actuated by the same hopes and fears, the same loves and hates, the same ambitions, the same local prejudices and jealousies. The reason generally assigned for favoring such an amendment seems to me the strongest possible argument against it. Namely, that the legislators who are elected by direct vote of the people are likely to be corrupted by men of wealth who, wanting in wisdom or integrity, will buy their way into the United States Senate. Very few instances of that kind have occured in which proof was available. Charges of that character have been made in some three or four states,but upon investigation the most of them were found to be false, because if established it would be the duty of the Senate to prevent their being seated, as has been the case when such proof has been made. One reaching the exalted position of United States Senator, and becoming a member of that, the wisest, most exalted,and conservative legislative body in the world will soon find his level, and if he is not possessed of wisdom and probity he is powerless for good or harm.

The people by direct vote elect the legislators who elect United States Senators, they also elect their Governors, and in some states their Judges. I think that it will be conceded that United States Senators elected by legistatures will in character and wisdom compare favorably with any of these thus chosen by the people, and do not think that it will be questioned that the men we select to represent us in the legislature as a body fairly represent the intelligence and virtue of their constituency. That there shall be found black sheep in every flock is true, but their number is limited, and they are sure to be discovered and exposed. A man may be a very honest mechanic or artisan, merchant or farmer, but it does not follow that if he became a member of the legislature he would be an honest legislator,or rather office holder. Temptation there presents itself in, to him,an unusual form; and a few fall, but the great body remain true to their oath.

With our laws against bribery of legislators,and our wide-awake sleepless vigilance of our public press,the chances of an unfit man, through corrupt means, reaching the United States Senate,are almost impossible. And if he should succeed, the chances of his being seated in that body are alike difficult when the charges are sustained by proof.

It is only in the newer states admitted into the union long after the adoption of the constitution that any such scandals have arisen. Some half dozen out of forty-five states,and to strike at our organic law in consequence is in my mind the heigth of folly, and should be, as it heretofore has been, indignantly frowned upon by the United States Senate.

THINGS & PEOPLE

By BOSWELL Jr.

The Mayor and the Auditor.

IT IS just as well that the mayor and auditor have locked horns over civil service at this stage of the game, because they may, before they get through with it, settle the vexed question of the mayor's right to make removals. In the opinion of most good lawyers, this power does not belong to the head of the municipality but to the courts, and the mayor who usurps it usurps the prerogative of the courts. An official cannot be removed except for malfeasance or misfeasance, and it is not for the mayor to say whether or no the official has misused his power. The little tilt with the auditor should bring things to a head and settle the question for the guidance and the good of future administrations.

As for the civil service question, which is quite a different story, it may be said to hang in the balance. Civil service under the new charter is young, and has not been fairly tested, but it has not been a dizzy success. Complaints that the power of the examiners is used by way of favoritism is very general. No proof is advanced to substantiate these grumblings, but they are persistent. Exactly like any other radical law, it cannot be fully enforced until the people in general are ready to accept it. Civil service may be written on every page of the charter, but if the citizens of San Francisco and the officials whom they elect and keep watch on are not ready for it, the instrument is of no practical use. And it must be admitted that the good people under Phelan's rule and the officials who represent them have not signified an overwhelming eagerness to assist. Education all along the line is the thing needed.

The Nome Rush in San Francisco.

THE Nome rush is fairly on. The ships which have left the port of San Franciso since the exodus began have been loaded as heavily as the law allows with passengers and freight. Many steamers have been taken off their own lines to meet the demand,and still passage is engaged up to the close of the season. Notwithstanding the amount of Cape Nome business which has gone through the port since the excitement began and will go before it is over, it is doubtful if it will be of much benefit to San Francisco. Fifteen thousand persons, altogether, will be drawn from the city this year. Of these, the majority are people of moderate capital and great energy,young men and vigorous, the class which "makes things go." We could better afford to miss any other class. Still another result which has a bearing upon the welfare of the city will be a lowering of returns in the coming national census. Most of these people will go on or before June and will return next fall, but they will be gone just when the census is in process of being taken. The returns from San Francisco will thus be at least ten thousand short of the true figure.

The Youth of the Female Suffragist.

EARL BARNES, an old Californian and an educator known to every teacher in the State, has been making in England some of his well-known experiments in child study. Mr. Barnes is the inventor of this system in education, and his first data were gathered in the public schools of California. The method is a new thing in England, and is quite a craze with the teachers on that side, who are the more ready to accept new things since they have not been pestered to death by cranks, as have the American "school-marmy." Recently, Mr. Barnes tested the ideals of five hundred young boys and girls in the English common schools by asking them the following questions: 1. "Which would you rather be when you grow up, a man or a woman, and why?" 2. "What man or woman of whom you have ever heard or read would you wish to be, and why?" The answers received may not be of much value scientifically, but they are vastly amusing. To begin with, only two boys out of the lot would rather be women than men, and they do not advance reasons, while nearly one-third of the girls would prefer the sex triumphant. Of those who stand by their own sex, there are some female suffragists of eleven who have already learned to rave at the tyrant man. "I wish to be a woman because they have so much more sense than a man," writes one, and another says: "A woman, because they are braver than men; they can do things quickly. Men are clumsy, besides, men drink." "A woman, because women do things while men are just talking," writes a third. Quite at the opposite extreme were two little prigs who rebuked the examiner for asking such a rebellious question. "I would rather be a woman because God has made us all according to his will," and "I would choose to be a woman because Nature made me one, and we must be content." This last one would like to be "a writer of hymns like Mr. Limestone, because he was the author of lovely hymns."

The one-third who wish to be men have widely different reasons. A good part of them have the war fever and would like to change sexes to go out and fight. One quaint little maid, in whose composition one reads some bitter home experience, says: "I would rather be a man, because a man is more useful and respectable than a woman, especially when a woman takes to drink; then she makes home miserable." Again, one writes: "I should like to be a man because he has no worry preying on his mind, such as women have. The only woman I would care to be is the Queen, because she is waited on, everything is brought to her, she never has dishes to wash, and she ought to be happy," and another: "A man, of course. He just has to get up, and he finds the fire lighted and breakfast ready. He goes to his work, and when he comes home tea is ready; then he does nothing but smoke his pipe, and go out, and do what he likes." And, finally, one prefers her own trampled sex, "Because we can go in for nice situations and we are nicer looking and have more ability than men, besides we are not so much occupied and can go to parties. Women do not dig coal and drain the streets like men and come in with their dirty boots and make the parlor carpet a disgrace!" And then you wonder at the spread of woman suffrage!

Yale vs. California.

I PROPHECIED several weeks back that the University of California's 1900 track team would make a comparatively poor showing in the East. It was, therefore, with the camplacence of a prophet who sees his predictions fulfiled that I watched the telegrams come in announcing that Yale had won—8½ to 3½. Not but that I would have been glad with all Californians to see a victory coming to the young men of California's oldest university, but I have felt all along,as other impartial judges have felt, that this is not the year for an Eastern trip. The team now on tour is not an exceptional one, being under rather than over the average. Several stronger aggregations have been gathered at Berkeley, notably the old Eastern team of '95. Moreover, at least three of the best men—Hoffman, Broughton and Drum have shown little or no form this season and seem to be past their best atheletic days. Yale won from the Californians; Pennsylvania, with the wonder Krantzlein, will surely win, as should Princeton, although there the contest will be closer. Plaw is the only Californian likely to get a point in the Mott Haven games, and Wisconsin is just about sure of the Western intercollegiates. This will send the Californians home without a victory worth the mention. It is too bad that it was tried this year, for the excellent atheletic material jurt about to enter from the high schools guarantees Berkeley a crack-a-jack team within the next two seasons.

St. Mary's Park.

THE commissioners have done the expected by letting the St. Mary's Park scheme lapse, through lack of general interest. The money appropriated for the purpose goes back to the Panhandle fund, and the chance for a breathing-place to lighten the morals of the region bordering on Chinatown and Barbary Coast is as slender as ever. The experience of other cities proves that the surest way of cleaning out any vice-infected district is to "let in the light" by a park or a public playground. This was pointed out at the time when the park was under discussion, yet indifferent S n Francisco never took any genuine interest, being diverted by the more showy and much less substantial panhandle idea. And it is not likely that official interest will again be aroused. The fault lies with the rank and file of the city's voters who are—whisper it low—vastly and densely ignorant about modern ways in municipal business.

An Alaskan Possibility.

THE Alaskan Indians have always been strangely quiet as regards the encroachments of the whites. Every other part of our national domain has been gained only at the expense of bloody wars with the natives. Even in California, where the aborigines were quiet and peaceful almost to the verge of degeneracy, the argonauts met at times with bloody resistance. But Alaska has never known an Indian war. It is only now, when murmurs of discontent are heard among the natives on the borders of Lynn Canal, that we realize the possibility of an uprising. Yet such a thing is strictly within the bounds of probability. The natives of Alaska are nearly as numerous as the whites; they are armed and skilled in the use of arms, and they have, no doubt, their wrongs. The degenerate peoples of the coast will hardly make trouble, but it is different, far different, with the real, true aborigines of the interior, who are a fine, hardy race, as yet almost untouched by Caucasian vices. An Indian uprising during the next summer could make a good deal of history in Alaska.

What is described in the technical language of the laundries as a domestic finish has long been recognized as the only proper way of preparing shirts and collars, and the man who appears with a shiny shirt front displays ignorance of men's fashions. The objection to a shiny surface has now been extended until it included other extremities in man's dress. Bootblacks may work for a long time to give the highest degree of polish possible to shoes, but they are not helping their customer to follow the latest style. In fact, the polished black leather boot is not admissible. It should be only a dull, dead black surface, with no suggestion of a shine. This style is followed nowadays by all men who make a point of keeping up with the latest changes in the fashions and its modishness depends presumably on several circumstances. This style of blacking a shoe shows that it was done at home and not at one of the ordinary places accessible to everybody. It also shows, from the poor way in which it was done, that the manipulator was an Englishman, presumably a groom or a valet. The combination of these various circumstances has made the style imitated by those who think it possesses desirable qualities, even if in the minds of the uninformed it may look as if the wearer had blacked his own boots.

THE MUTUAL SAVINGS BANK COMPETITION.

First Prize Design by William Curlett.

IT is natural for the public to take an interest in any new building, and particularly one about to be erected on the busiest block of Market street, and on a portion of the once famous Blythe estate.

In January last the Mutual Savings Bank invited a number of prominent architects to enter into a limited competition; of course on the strict assumption, that, since only a limited number were selected, they each and all were considered fit and competent and of sufficient experience and probity to be entrusted with the responsibilities of erecting so important a structure. Consequently it is presumed that no preference whatever obtained other than that based upon the excellence of the plans submitted.

The conditions called for a ten story steel frame fire-proof building to go on the lot, which by the way is 53 feet on Market street and 74 on Geary. The end facing the gore, and which after all will present the most notable aspect on approaching from the ferries, is just 50 feet across. The ground floor is to include a banking office and a 20-foot store on the western boundary of the lot on Market street, also elevator and bank entrances from both streets. The upper floors are to contain offices designed to produce the greatest revenue. After enumerating the drawings required and stating that they are to be submitted anonymously, and that the directors of the bank are to make the awards, the programme, which so far has not contained a superfluous word, comes to a conclusion with the announcement "that it is intended that the construction of building shall be superintended by a builder under the supervision of the successful competitor."

In response, eight architects out of those invited submitted plans. The reader had some idea of the problem, and the pictures herewith presented will give some notion of how the architects solved it—or a part of it, for the entire problem by no means consists in presenting an agreeable structure to the eye of the wayfarer, although that is perhaps what most interests the man on the street and incidentally readers of the Wave.

It will be noted that the solutions are various. They represent all shades of architectural intelligence and incidentally show what could be done with the problem and what should be done with the problem, what should not be done with it, and also what will be done with it.

In the interest of plain, straighforward competition, reference must be made to a point of great importance in this problem, and one on which the competitors seemed all at sea. Strictly speaking, no property owner has any right to overhang his neighbor. No matter how high one may build, at no altitude is a man justified in projecting out over his neighbor's property, with any mouldings whatever, even to the extent of the fraction of an inch. Both law and common sense are at one on this. Where a tall building abuts a low one, a projection of a four-foot cornice over the latter may neither incommode nor menace the building beneath. But the owner of the latter has a right to demand compensation, or, he may by courtesy permit the overhang, but the transgression should be mutually arranged.

In consequence of a hazy interpretation of this point the plans exhibit all degrees of treatment on the east wall from the plain bald solid brick party wall of Messrs. Pissis and Van Trees, to the absolutely full scheme of fenestration and finish in the design of Mr. Curlett, in which bold treatment the building has three connected fronts—a gore building in fact—instead of two independent and unconnected facades on two different streets. The scheme submitted by Mr. Percy is a frank attempt to solve the problem without begging the question.

The introduction of a shallow light area on the east end of this composition produces a very happy result, as seen in the clever prospective drawing, the work undoubtedly of Mr. Polk. Just how this would affect the plan is not shown. If the one plan published, however, is a fair sample of the others, they must have been of exceptional merit. It is very difficult to conceive how this plan could possibly be improved. It is clear and orderly and is stamped all over with the hall mark of the master—simplicity. The exterior is equally simple and scholarly.

Among the other designs, the most notable appears to be that submitted by Tharp and Holmes, inasmuch as it is an effort to treat a facade as some expression of the new conditions of modern steel construction. As such, the effort is to be applauded. Although the first story is hardly impressive enough for a bank, the design throughout has some character and originality about it that is very modern and very interesting.

Apart from niceties of detail it may be broadly stated that the design adopted, if carried out as shown, will present the most pleasing ensemble, the high pitched tiled roof and the broken skyline producing an effect both agreeable and picturesque—a notable embellishment to the long vista of Market street.

WITH THE BOER ARMY.

Life Is a Military Camp of the Transvaal Army.

WHILE there is no extraordinary work being done by the "descriptive" war correspondents in the South African campaign, there have been some interesting and chatty accounts contributed to the London dailies. Perhaps the best of these are the articles contributed to the Daily News. South Africa is many weeks away from San Francisco by the mails, and descriptive articles are mailed and not telegraphed. Therefore, the articles on the campaigning around Bloemfontein, just preceding its capture, are only just now available. Perhaps the best bit in this mass of correspondence is H. F. Prevost Battersby's description of the wounded at Dreifontein. After relating the slow, cover-to-cover progress of the British riflemen, he goes on:

"The path of such a progress tells next day its silent story. Not alone by those spaces of new turned earth that wear only the badge of the regiment's honor, telling by name or burgeon that here and there it left its dead, but by the dark stiff fragments of the first aid bandages, the red stained scraps of newspaper pressed in vain against a wound, a boot still slimy with the blood which filled it, a water bottle with the stuff that dripped on its felt. These and worse, and the worst the least horrible—the claw marks, where desperate fingers tried to drag the wounded body along the ground into some sort of safety, or those deeper scars where the booted toes dug out their groaning agony into the grass.

"That gives one a better conception of the battle than pictures of charging men. Modern fighting is mostly a crawl. The legendary order of Waterloo will have to be amended: "Down, Guards, and at them!" is the new injunction. The old curse of the serpent is become the soldiers' watchword, "Upon thy belly thou shalt go."

But the old valor and the old glory stay. The men of the Essex went over the ridge in a fashion to make hearts leap with envy which were not with them. The hill was long and thick with tangled grass, the edge of the enemy's laagars were red coronets of fire, but nothing could stay them, and nothing that was Boer by nature would stay for them. The old ruse had been tried already. Some Boers had leaped up on the sky line, their rifles slung over their shoulders their hands above their heads, and when our men rose to the whistle, had shot them down. The ruse was repeated on the right, but this time it was the Boers who fell, and those who did not raced for their horses and rode for their lives.

Beside other actions of the war, that at Dreifontein may seem a small one, but Bloemfontein was abandoned because of it, and it may prove to be the last fight on Free State soil.

A Tribute to the Boers.

A. C. Hales, of the Daily News, has all along expressed the greatest admiration for Boer pluck and valor. He was taken prisoner in the campaigning around Ladysmith, and followed their army in detention. He says of his experience:

"I was only a prisoner in their hands for about a month, yet every moment of that time was so fraught with interest that I fancy I picked up more of the real nature of the Boers than I should have done under ordinary circumstances in a couple of years. I was moved from laager to laager along their fighting line; saw them at work with their rifles; saw them come in from more than one tough skirmish, bringing their dead and wounded with them; saw them when they had triumphed and saw them when they had been whipped; saw them going to their farms to be welcomed by wife and children; saw them leaving home with a wife's sobs in their ears and children's loving kisses on their lips. I saw some of these old gray heads shattered by our shells, dying grimly, with knitted brows and fiercely clenched jaws; saw some of their beardless boys sobbing their souls out as the life-blood dyed the African heath. I saw some passing over the border line which divides life and death, with a ring of stern-browed comrades round them, leaning upon their rifles, while a brother or a father knelt and pressed the hand of him whose feet were on the very threshold of the land beyond the shadows. I saw others smiling up into the faces of women—the poor, pain-drawn faces of the dying looking less haggard and worn than the anguish-stricken features of their womanhood who knelt to comfort them in that last awful hour—in the hour which divides time from eternity, the sunlight of lusty life rom the shadows of unsearchable death. Those things If have seen, and in the ears of English men and women let me say, as one who knows and fain would speak the plain, ungilded truth concerning friend and foe, that not alone beneath the British flags are heroes found. Not alone at the breasts of British matrons are brave men suckled; for, as my soul liveth, whether their cause be just or unjust, whether the right or the wrong of this war be with them—whether the blood of the hundreds that have fallen since the first rifle spoke defiance shall speak for or against them at the Day of Judgment—they at least know how to die; and when a man has given his life for the cause he believes in, he is proven worthy even of his worst enemy's respect. And it seems to me that the British nation, with its long roll of heroic deeds, wrought the world over, from Africa to Iceland, can well afford to honor the splendid bravery and self-sacrifice of these rude, untutored tillers of the soil. I have seen them die.

"Once as I lay a prisoner in a rocky ravine, all through the hot afternoon, I heard the rifles snapping like hounds around a cornered beast. I watched the Boers as they moved from cover to cover, one here, one there, a little further on a couple in a place of vantage, again in a natural fortress a group of eight; so they were placed as far as my eye could reach. The British force I could not see at all. They were out on the veldt, and the kopjes hid them from me; but I could hear the regular roar and ripple of their disciplined volleys, and in course of time, by watching the actions of the Boers, I could anticipate the sound.

"One sight I saw which will stay with me while memory lasts. They had placed me under a wagon, beneath a mass of overhanging rocks for safety, and there they brought two wounded men. One was a man of fifty, a hard old veteran, with a complexion as dark as a New Zealand Maori. The beard that framed his rugged face was three-fourths gray; his hands were as rough and knotted by open air toil as the hoofs of a working steer. He looked what he was—a Boer of mixed Dutch and French lineage. Later on I got into conversation with him, and he told me a good deal of his life. His father was descended from one of the old Dutch families who had emigrated to South Africa in search of religious liberty in the old days when the country was a wilderness. His mother had come in an unbroken line from one of the noble families of France who fled from home in the days of the terrible persecution of the Huguenots. He himself had been many things—hunter, trader, farmer and fighting man. He had fought against the natives, and he had fought against our people. The younger man was his son, a tall, fair fellow, scarcely more than a stripling, and I had no need to be a prophet to tell that his very hours were numbered. Both men had been wounded by one of our shells and it was pitiful to watch them as they lay side by side, the elder holding the hand of the younger in a loving clasp, while with his other hand he stroked the boyish face with gestures that were infinitely pathetic. Just as the stars were coming out that night between the clouds that floated over us, the Boer boy sobbed his young life out, and all through the long watches of that mournful darkness the father lay with his dear laddie's hand in his. The pain of his own wounds must have been dreadful, but I heard no moan of anguish from his lips. When at the dawning they came to take the dead boy from the living man the stern old warrior simply pressed his grizzled lips to the cold face, and then turned his gray beard to the hard earth and made he further sign."

The London Telegraph man has not a very high opinion of Boer marksmanship, believing that the serious damage wrought by their shooting is caused mainly by their clever use of cover. He also contributes something to the discussion regarding the British officer's custom of standing up under fire: Continued on Page 9.

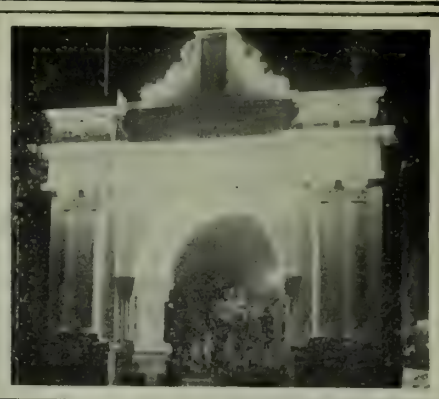
The Street Fair at Sacramento.



The Royal Carriage.

SACRAMENTO has risen superior to the weather. The clerk evidently "had it in" for California's capital city, and sent a heavy rain on May 1, May Day, the time set for the floral parade and the main day of the whole street fair by which the town made merry last week. It drenched and spoiled the bunting, it beat in the booths, it turned enclosures of packed earth into trampled mud-holes. But for all that, the good citizens of the town went ahead just the same, replacing the soaked and bedraggled bunting with fresh stuff, withered flowers by new ones, scattering earth and straw over the mud-holes. The weather, realizing that Sacramento was not to be beaten, shifted and helped out; the sun shone brightly in the afternoon, and on May 2, the stores closed, the people thronged the streets and a delayed May Day was held under blue skies.

Sacramento did herself proud all through. To tell the absolute truth, the towns of Northern California have never been as successful as have their southern sisters in carrying out these flower festivals. Nature is kinder in the Southland and the Spanish fiesta lingers among the people, so that they take to it all more naturally. But Sacramento was wise in making it not all a flower festival. It wasa street fair and a good one, with side-shows and fakirs and incidentally some midway features which shocked the susceptible ministry, and the floral parade was only an adjunct. This feature shone by reason of the individual excellence of the rather modest displays, the absence of any artistic abominations such as have disfigured parades of the sort in other California cities, and the prettiness of the girls in the displays. The Queen, this time, was a real beauty, and her tasteful little turnout was a star feature. There were a few horrible arches and some rather eccentric decorations, but those are a necessary evil in an occasion of the kind.

Barring the rain, everything went off with a rush, from the coronation of the queen to the merry and noisy masking which always ends up a California fiesta. A feature which calls for especial attention was the Chinese section of the parade. California has scorned the humble heathen, more or less, in former fiestas. The citizens of the capital were wise in overruling prejudice and giving a chance to the people with whom the pageant is an art. Neither the dragon parade of the Los Angeles festivals nor the small but beautiful display made by San Francisco's Chinatown in the July Fourth parade equalled the Oriental section of this festival. Fittings and trappings had been brought from all parts of the State, the Chinese Consul lent his encouragement, and the humble heathen did the rest. Yes, after all, the honors of the occasion belonged to the yellow stranger within our gates.

The Chinese pageant was a revelation to hosts of the visitors as well as to Sacramentans, who had never seen a demonstration conducted upon such a scale of magnificence, the dragon itself taking up almost a block. The Chinese handled this ingeniously constructed figure so dextrously that they produced at regular intervals a whip of the tail, much to the edification of the Chinese residents and visiting countrymen, who looked upon the spectacle with profound awe. The promoters of the pageant were obliged to give bonds in the sum of $4000 for the safe return of the banners, costumes and accouterments. This feature was not without its humorous accompaniments. In the first days of the Fair, when a band of San Francisco Turks came up with their camels and a dog, the Sacramento pound-man lassooed the dog. It took all the influence which Mayor Clark could summon to save the Arabian beast from the glue pot. So on parade day, when the band of Chinese dragon escorts had landed and started on a tour of the town, they were set upon by the inescapable poll tax gatherers. The Chinese protested that they did not belong in Sacramento, but were engaged for the carnival, but all Chinese look alike to the tax collectors, and they would have levied on them had not the mayor interfered.

WITH THE BOER ARMY.

"The minute fighting begins the men lie down, but the officers stalk about giving signals, waving their arms, smoking cigars and generally behave as if they were in Piccadily. I watched a young man at the battle of Pieter's Hill carrying his rifle under his arm, as one does one's gun when walking between the beats of a covert shoot; in his other hand he had a walking stick, with which he was pointing out where his men were to fire. The soldiers were carefully hidden, and he was under a merciless fire—but I saw him next morning trudging gaily to Ladysmith, none the worst for his day's fighting. Indeed, it does not much matter—if you are going to be hit you'll catch it whether or not you disguise yourself as a private. Habit is a strong thing, hard to get rid of. You may dress a British subaltern or captain of the infantry of the line how you like, but if he is of the right sort you can "spot" him as far asy ou can see him.

"Certainly, at close range the Boers have made a dead set at our officers; an officer of my old regiment got two in his thigh, one through his hand, three through the helmet and his right arm was shot off. This is certainly extremely businesslike shooting, but the damage was done at about three hundred yards, when all men shoot fairly well. On the other hand, the Boers blaze away an alarming amount of bullets which hit nothing at longer distances. I have described my own experiences, but twice I have seen the South African Light Horse under heavy rifle fire, as harmless as it was heavy—three or four men hit out of three or four hundred. Compare this with the shooting of the Bazingers in our zareba at Gubat, where they wiped out every man who stood on his feet. I have already told you how I was missed at close range by twenty or thirty riflemen, and, on the whole, I don't think the Boer army is above our average in shooting. Where they are facile princepes is at mounted infantry work; at seizing and abandoning or reinforcing a position, as necessity may compel; their tenacious clinging to a place they know to be necessary to their safety, and their sure eye for such a position.

"Indeed, against a slowly moving army like ours, whose precise tactics compel it to shift in a leisurely manner, they are very formidable. Each good Boer is a general in himself, each pile of stones he shoots from a fortress in itself; a commando of three hundred men in a good position means three hundred fortresses to be taken. Then the Boers let off their ammunition unstintingly, as far as they can see; they shoot, not because they think they will hit anything, but for the very good reason that nothing demoralizes an enemy more than bullets coming from an unseen rifle; indeed, the Boers produce great moral effects with their little bullets. They are extremely busy at two thousand yards. I will bet any man that he will not walk twenty yards slowly across a bit of flat ground under fire from the Boers at two thousand yards' range and whistle "God Save the Queen" at the same time. If any one accepts my bet, he will see what he will see.

"What affords the Boers most glee is our regular cavalry. Indeed, it does present a ludicrous appearance in this country of stones and kopjes. I often wonder what would happen to a regular cavalry brigade if surprised, armed as they are, with lance, sabre and carbine. The untidy Boer horseman, with his grass fed pony, lopes along quite regardless of his formidable looking adversary. If the lancer attempts violence, the Dopper dismounts and shoots. Our colonial cavalry is a little better, but they suffer considerably from their want of knowledge of horses. Even they are no match for the Boer at the game of hide and seek; fortunately, they are brave and have a general, not yet eradicated, contempt for the Dutchmen, and often achieve by audacity what they would be unable to accomplish if their usually wily enemy did not think them as formidable as they look. Their work in Natal, however, cannot be sufficiently extolled. It is one of the most pleasing features of the campaign. It is almost certain that our cavalry will have to be differently trained, at all events armed with a long rifle. The day of shock action is practically over. Those vast plains of Germany and Austria, where Murat's legions thundered to victory, are now intersected with wire fences."

Boer Life in Camp.

An Australian correspondent, who was for a long time a prisoner to the Free State Boers, gives this graphic description of life in a Boer laager:

"In war time the Boer never, under any circumstancess makes his laager in the open country if there are any kopje, about. No matter how secure he may fancy himself from attack, no matter if there is not a foe within fifty miles of him, the Boer commander always pitches his laager in a place of safety between two parallel lines of hills, so that no attack can be made upon him, either front or rear, without giving an alarm.

"When the scouts are out, the laager is fixed for the night; not a very exhaustive proceeding, as the Boers do not go in for luxuries of any kind. Here a tarpaulin is stretched over a kind of temporary ridge pole, blankets are tossed down on the hard earth, saddles are used for pillows, and the couch is complete. A little way further down the line, a rude canvas screen is thrown over the wheels of a wagon, and a family—or, rather, husband and wife—make themselves at home under the wagon, while the single men simply throw themselves at full length on the ground, wrap their one thin, small blanket round them, and smoke and jest merrily enough, while the Kaffirs light the fires and make the coffee.

"There is scarcely any timber in this part of Africa, and the fuel used is the dried manure of cattle, pressed into slabs about fifteen inches long, eight inches wide and three inches thick. The smoke from the fires is dense, and soon fills the air with a pungent odor, which is not unpleasant. The coffee is soon made, and the simple meal begins. It consists of "rusks," a kind of bread baked until it becomes crisp and hard, and plenty of steaming hot coffee. I never saw any people so fond of this beverage as the Boers are. The Australian bushman and digger loves tea, and can almost exist upon it, but these Boers cling to coffee. They live when out in laager like Spartans, they dress anyhow, sleep anyhow, and eat just "rusks" and precious little else.

"After tea the Boers sit about and clean their rifles; the women move from one little group to another, chatting cheerfully; but I saw nothing in their conduct or in the conduct of any man toward one of them that would cause the most chaste matron in Great Britain to blush or droop her eyes. There is in the laager an utter absence of what we term soldierly discipline; men moved about, went and came in a free and easy fashion, just as I have seen them do a thousand times in diggers' camps. There was no saluting of officers, no stiffness, no starch anywhere. The General lounges about with hands in pocket and pipe in mouth; no one pays him any special deference. He talks to the men, the striplings and the women, and they talk back to him in a manner which seems strange to a Britisher familiar with the ways of military camps. After the chatting, the bridikant, or parson, if there is one in the laager, raises his hands, and all listen with reverent faces while the man of God utters a few words in a solemn, earnest tone; then all kneel, and a prayer floats up toward the skies, and a few moments later the whole camp is wrapped in sleep, nothing is heard but the neighing of horses, the lowing of cattle, the bleating of sheep and the occasional barking of a dog. There is no clatter of arms, no ringing of bugles, no deep-toned challenge of sentries, no footfall of changing pickets."

American Stage Favorites of the Hour.

NEW YORK.

Social Gossip of the Demi-Season.

LONDON.

IT SEEMS to me, sometimes, that all the actors on the London stage are destined eventually to come from America, as grand opera people come from Germany and France and acrobats from Algiers! Such a crowd as there has been of late! The Goodwins, Edna May, Holbrook Blinn, Mrs Potter, Mrs. Leslie Carter—the list could be strung out indefinitely. And, when I come to think of it, American things in general are very much the fashion in gay London Some of the conservative ladies of the land with horse-hair ideas on etiquette, have just been complaining editorially that Americanism has ruined the poise and repoise of English life. There is a deal of truth in this; the American tendencies have killed the stiffness of British life—the greater the blessing! The gay, insouciant free and a trifle saucy American girl is model for the English maiden of high society. Perhaps you remember that little play, "A Box of Monkeys," fashionable for parlor entertainments a decade ago? If you do, you will remember how the stiff, angular English girl therein beseeches the cow-girl from Nevada to teach her "slang and fascination." That is what the English girl is now striving for—"slang and fascination" on the American plan. Our accent, for which, there are few defenders among educated Americans, is sedulously copied; our slang, down to its very worst, is heard in the drawing-rooms; our mixed drinks, and our perpendicular way of absorbing them, our books, even our plays, are "the things." It is an aftermath of the Anglo Saxon alliance, I suppose. When comes the aftermath of our ungrateful attitude on the Boer war, the fashion will change, I suppose. It is only a fad, but just now the term "so American!" is no longer accompanied by a deprecating shrug.

To return to the actors. The vaudeville sensation of the hour is a troop of American zouaves, who have the favored "10:15" turn at the Empire, the period always reserved at that playhouse for the star number. I believe that they are little known at home, so that a bit of history will not come amiss. These people—"The Streator Troupe" they call themselves—are advertised as the "Champion Drill Team of the World," and war-crazy London willingly grants them the claim. They had performed in America about a year when they were caught up and featured by a London manager.

Their origin was due to the enthusiasm of a retired army officer with a home-sickness for drill and and a sanguine belief in the possibilities of the human machine. Major Keller, U. S. A., the gentleman in question, belongs to the little town of Streator, Illinois. Some five years ago he picked out eighteen sober and likely lads of the place, and began to drill them for his own amusement. Good progress was made, though they were all in different business employments and had not much leisure for drilling. In course of time they became so proficient that the Major was proud to show them off at local charity performances. Increase of proficiency and fame came by natural stages, until at last they received such munificent offers as to justify them in abandoning their business and taking to the stage.

Their personal habits are such as would give the W. C. T. U. much pleasure. To a man, they are strictly temperate. They say that they have to do it in order to keep their nerves straight. On their arrival the management tendered them a luncheon, and twenty were present. They had what they liked, and were given carte blanche in the matter of liquid refreshment. When the manager saw the bill, he determined to have it framed. The food came to the reasonable figure of £4 10s. The bill for drinks for twenty people was 4s. 6d.! Needless to say, the items were lemonade and ginger-beer.

They are just plain, wholesome middle-West boys, with a Western twang to their voices and free Western ways, and we exiled Americans in London love them for it and are doing our best to spoil them by too many attentions. I have to leave the question of their merits to the military experts, who say that for straight drill it is the greatest ever.

The other American star at the Empire is "Doc," a trained Yankee dog with marvellous intelligence and a set of gold-filled teeth, which are heavily exploited by the press-agents. He is a mongrel pup, picked up, as an orphan, from the streets of New York, and educated by Mr. Harry Edson. "Doc" is a born actor, being happiest when exhibiting before company and taking delight in showing off to visitors even in private life. Yes, decidedly, the Yankee zouaves and the Yankee dogs are the Empire's best turns this season.

Then, Mrs. Leslie Carter is preparing to cull New London triumphs in "Zaza," a play of a class much more complacently received in London than in New York. Her leading man, Charles A. Stevenson, is only returning to his own side, for he is Irish-born, although he learned his business in America. I will be very much surprised if Zaza does not catch London's fancy this year.

More than these play-actors is an American builder of plays, Stanislaus Strange, who has rebuilt the drama of "Quo Vadis," using in novel and two forgotten French plays. It is by far the best acting drama yet built on the theme, a play, vital, intelligent to those who have never read the novel, and not a series of tableau strung together on a a thread. Indeed, it follows the book very loosely or not at all; Strange himself claims to have done no more than borrow the atmosphere and names of the original. The production in New York, under the same title was his also, but it was only the germ on which his present conception was built. He has it under rehearsal now, and the first night should come off before this reaches you.

KATRIONA.

NEW YORK.

THE Cuban Orphan Festival has been a greater success than the most enthusiastic New Yorker could have anticipated. The opera house was like a scene in fairyland. The decorations were fitted to represent all the different countries, and women dressed in costumes appropriate for each attended the booths. It is difficult in as great a crowd as filled the house to describe the most picturesque stall or name the most elaborately dressed. Owing to the bad weather the first three days, many people feared a failure, but after that, the crowd was so dense that it was quite difficult to get about. Many of those so deeply interested in the Maine fund concert for the relief of the "Tommy Atkins," given a few weeks ago, attended the fair one or two nights. These few women were not the ones who made the great success of the affair, apparently. They thought by putting in an appearance for a short time, and by the publication of their names in the papers, they would get the benefit of being praised by the American people. It seems curious that daughters of British aristocracy were constant in their attendance, and assiduous in their efforts to swell the receipts of the festival. In fact, the action of the "Tommy Atkins" set as they are how called, both in organizing the "Maine Fund" concert, and in abstaining from participation in the "Cuban Festival" will form a remarkable chapter in the social history of New York. This has been more of a beauty show than a fair, and those who wished to show their appreciation of the trouble and labor spent by the representative New York women, will aid the support of widows and orphans down in Cuba. With the close of this festival, we have a wonderful concert for the relief of the Boer wounded. The progamme has been made most brilliant. Nordica, Nocautelli and Bertram will help to make this affair a great success. Society, with its usual sense of a good thing, will crowd the house. The element of the smart set that is bent on rebuking the snobbish crowd that engineered the "Tommy Atkins" benefit will see that this concert be carried out with appropriate eclat.

Of course a loud protest has come up from the British sympathizer to the effect that with a war of our own in the Philippines, it is a misguided charity to collect for a foreign nation. However, New York has already given twelve thousand dollars to Mrs. Adair for "Tommy Atkins", so that I suppose a similar sum will be raised for the Boer wounded. Mrs. Adair has made herself very unpopular in New York. She is an American who lives in London, and has the entre into a very fashionable set, and frequently entertains the "Prince". She came out to New York to beg from those people whom she had helped socially in London. Mrs. Adair, however, was not sufficiently diplomatic in her work. She made many enemies, was criticized most severely, and not even in London did she reap the reward she anticipated. It seems that her collection did not consist of a sufficient number of ciphers. Perhaps this idea of thinking more of any other nation than one's own must end sooner or later. The papers all over the country have begun to resent the fact that our war is a secondary affair now, to the one that the British are fighting down in South Africa.

The Robert Barret Brownings are again enjoying the pleasure of making themselves the subject of much gossip. Mrs. Browning is at the Palazzo Rezzonico in Venice. She lost half a million about a year ago, and lives in the big Palazzo devoid of a furnace or any other means of artificial heat, owing, she says, to her extreme poverty. She is, of course, in the hands of an English doctor, who finds Venice from a monetary standpoint quite worth while, also a wonderful French chef. Robert Browning is up at Asola with his father's sister. The Brownings' marital affairs commenced to dissemble when Mrs. Browning, who was a Miss Coddington of Albany, decided that the model she had specially imported from Florence was too attractive.

The girl, after passing through a very uncomfortable state of unjust criticism, married an Italian engineer and returned to Italy. A reconciliation between the Brownings was effected, but a large palace and an hysterical wife overpowered Browning, so that now each goes his own way, unhappily.

Now that Mrs. James Brown Potter has been formally allowed a divorce from her husband, rumors of her marriage with Kyrle Bellew and General Kitchener have been announced. Mrs. Potter's friends say that she has often asserted her profound appreciation of how much Mr. Bellew had done for her, both in her professional and in personal affairs. She realizes how keenly he sacrificed his own artistic career in order to further hers. Nothing could induce her, these intimates protest, not even the fascinations of the woman-hating Sirdar, to abandon her long-time colleague, now that he has to a certain extent outlived his usefulness.

A quite remarkable dinner took place at Sherry's the other night. Mrs. Stuyvesant Fish was the hostess. It was given as a sort of farewell for the season, and each member of her particular set was allowed to be as lively as possible. Owing to its having taken place in a public place, on Sunday night, a good deal of talk was made of it. Curious how these things come out. It rather suggests the story of Helen Gould's secretary. Helen is a quiet young person, who would, perhaps, be quite happy were she not boomed by newspapers. She often wondered how it was her most minute act of charity became public property. She again and again reproached her secretary, but to no purpose. When, however, the minutae of her private correspondence was made into a very readable article for one of the papers, Miss Gould suggested to her secretary the necessity of leaving New York. It seems that Miss Gould trusted this young girl absolutely and had the greatest faith in her honor. The secretary is now seeking another position.

It is quite surprising these days how many navy men marry actresses. On the vessels in navy yards from time to time, a reception is given to actresses, which could not be possible anywhere else. New York, Boston and Philadelphians hold themselves very much aloof from actresses, whereas singers are very often welcomed there. Elsie de Wolf was in society before she went on the stage, so that she retained her social recognition, as did Annie Russel. A few years ago, when one of the very "advanced" set entertained Sara Bernhardt, society opened its eyes—but attended. Later, this same woman has entertained Duse, Olga Nethersole and many others. Emma Eames is really more in society than Nordica or Calve. The fact is, she has better manners and is as charming to the women as the men. Eames was the only singer and Elsie de Wolf the only actress invited to the Bradley-Martin ball. Of course, these women accept very few of the invitations they receive. Julian Story's position makes both his wife's and his place in society of quite a different nature from that of the absolute professional. Eames is invited not as the prima donna, but as Mrs. Julian Story. The South, with all its pride in blood and family, is infinitely more liberal in affairs of this kind. Perhaps for the reason that many Southern girls of position have gone on the stage, and never afterwards lost their social prestige.

Epicures in society have a new fad. There is a butcher in a queer old stall in the Catherine Market, one of the oldest in New York, who can outrival all others in his method of cooking. He has just been discovered. The fad is to have a beefsteak supper. Caterers who can provide the finest of ices and pale sandwiches know not the art of a well-cooked beefsteak. This mysterious cook is an Irishman who was the head of a culinary department in an Irish club, as a side issue to his stall in the market. He has to be engaged many evenings ahead of time, and with his own furnished steaks prepares the dish. The only things required are bread and butter, salt, red and white pepper and some mustard. As no plate, knives or forks are used the simplicity of the menu is apparent. The bread is rather thick, and upon each slice is placed a piece of steak of generous size. Each piece is treated to some mysterious grilling process, the above mentioned ingredients being used. It is, however, in the making of the sauce that lies the real secret of the beeksteak chef's success.

The bachelor is the chosen advocate and promoter of the beefsteak supper. He is supposed to be able to cook everything, and nowadays gives small suppers to his friends with the aid of this chef, chafing dishes and pewter pots of beer, his servants being dismissed for the occasion.

Many weddings have taken place lately, but the one which is occasioning the most attention is the burlesque wedding at the Artists' Festival tomorrow evening. It is said the bride will be a young man over six feet, whose identity has been kept a profound secret. The bridesmaids will also be young men, many of them members of the Somerset Club. Further particulars will come in next week's letter.

MOORE' POISON OAK REMEDY
Cures Poison Oak and All Skin Diseases. Sold by All Druggists.

Headache may be called a woman's ailment. Some men suffer from it. But almost all women have to endure its pain with each recurring month. This fact points at once to the intimate relation between the health of the delicate womanly organs, and the general health of the whole body. Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription banishes headache by banishing its cause. It cures the diseases which irritate the delicate womanly organs, fret the nerves and waste the strength. It increases the vitality and builds up the nervous system. "Favorite Prescription" contains no opium, cocaine or other narcotic.

"I want to praise your medicine," writes Mrs. Sarah J. Burney, of Cresent City, Putnam Co., Fla. "I have been sick for twenty years, and have been almost in bed five years, and now I am able to work all day. I have taken eight bottles of 'Favorite Prescription' and four of 'Golden Medical Discovery' and one vial of 'Pellets.' I praise your medicine to all. I had the headache but it is gone. My throat is well and cough gone, and all my old troubles are better. I tried many other kinds of medicine and four doctors."

IN BOOKDOM

WE in the West are no longer surprised when our next-door neighbor proves to be the man of the "vital soul," as Wordsworth phrased it. We are no longer surprised to see the steed Pegasus tied to our neighbor's hitching-post. I have in my hand rather a notable book by Mr. Jack London, who lives in Oakland, and whose work has been watched by some of us for a year or so as it appeared in the Overland Monthly and the Atlantic Monthly. This book—The Son of the Wolf—is a collection of nine Alaskan stories reprinted out of these two magazines. The publishers are Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston. Mr. London will be remembered by the readers of this paper as the author of a story that attracted considerable attention in the Christmas Wave. His work is somewhat unusual for a young man of his age—twenty-four.

Strength—the strength of bone and brawn, the strength of oak in the storm, the strength of steel in the battle-line, the rude, vigorous, native strength of him that overcomes in the contests with nature where nature is most austere, this is the strength that Mr. London exploits in his fiction. For in the White Silence of the North the veneerings of civilization are very soon stripped off a man, and he stands for what he is before his fellows, a giant or a pigmy. But giant or pigmy, he is very elemental man, with all the primitive passions and primitive virtues in strong relief. Brutality—in the physiological sense of the word—is the chief characteristic of him. He is not complex, but simple, as is the brute. His affections are the affections of the dog, his ferocity the ferocity of the wolf. His courage, his selfish unselfishness, his pertinacity, his faithfulness—all of them are brute virtues. His ethics are brutal ethics, mainly concerned with problems of self-preservation.

The same comparison might be made between the early gold coast studies of Bret Harte and these stories by Mr. London as between Bret Harte and Kipling. Bret Harte's stories also were studies of elemental man and the brutal ethics of self-preservation. Kipling, who avowedly took the earlier Californian as a model for the short story, saw this clearly, and elaborated upon the idea, or at least exploited it more definitely as a literary motif. His brutality thus at once passed from the naive to the self-conscious. He began speaking of the brute in man with a certain "knowingness" that often offended when he dwelt upon it with special insistence. What with Bret Harte had been but a detail of the story became with him the central idea of the story, as like as not. As a consequence he became known as the prophet of the brute side of human nature, the logical result of which was Stalky & Co. In that immortal apotheosis of animality, the Jungle Book, however, if in no other of his strong stories, Kipling justified his idea for all time. Yet it must be admitted that the Jungle Books are valued beyond the idealization of an idea. They are valued for the very qualities that are lacking in some of the more coarsely grained tales—the quality of being naive, for instance, and the absence of self-conscious "knowingness."

Mr. London is plainly and naturally a disciple of Kipling; in a much closer sense is he his disciple than was Kipling the disciple of Bret Harte. For he like Kipling, as Kipling never like Bret Harte, depicts the brute in man, the naked, elemental, primitive man, as main literary motif. In a way he goes farther than Kipling could go. His life in the North is more primitive, more elemental, than Kipling's Indian jungle life could possibly be. The White Silence, the cold white background that stretches into the sky on every side, brings out every nerve and sinew and bone of the hot-veined human body as no other background in the world could do. Mr. London exploits this brutal side of human nature with as great deliberateness as did Kipling, and he gets much the same effects. Whether he have humor or not remains to be seen; but in description, in imaginative phrasing, insight into character, sympathy with the men who break paths, inventiveness, and power of laying bare bone and sinew and nerve dramatically and convincingly, his work is of a very high order.

I quote a passage from one of Mr. London's stories, "An Odyssey of the North," to illustrate the vividness with which he can bring a picture before the reader:

Somebody knocked at the door a second time before Malemute Kid said "Come in." The door swung open. Something staggered in. Prince caught one square look and sprang to his feet. The horror in his eyes caused Malemute Kid to whirl about; and he too was startled, though he had seen bad things before. The thing tottered blindly toward them. Prince edged away till he reached the nail from which hung his Smith & Wesson.

"My God! what is it?" he whispered to Malemute Kid.

"Don't know. Looks like a case of freezing and no grub," replied the Kid, sliding away in the opposite direction. "Watch out! It may be mad," he warned, coming back from closing the door.

The thing advanced to the table. The bright flame of the slush-lamp caught its eye. It was amused, and gave voice to eldritch cackles which betokened mirth. Then, suddenly, he—for it was a man—swayed back, with a hitch to his skin trousers, and began to sing a chanty, such as men lift when they swing around the capstan circle and the sea snorts in their ears.

He broke off abruptly, tottered with a wolfish snarl to the meat-shelf, and before they could intercept was tearing with his teeth at a chunk of raw bacon. The struggle was fierce between him and Malemute Kid; but his mad strength left him as suddenly as it had come, and he weakly surrendered the spoil. Between them they got him upon a stool, where he sprawled with half his body across the table. A small dose of whisky strengthened him, so that he could dip a spoon into the sugar caddy which Malemute Kid placed before him. After his appetite had been somewhat cloyed, Prince, shuddering as he did so, passed him a mug of weak beef tea.

The creature's eyes were alight with a sombre frenzy, which blazed and waned with every mouthful. There was very little skin to the face. The face, for that matter, sunken and emaciated, bore very little likeness to a human countenance. Frost after frost had bitten deeply, each depositing its stratum of scab upon the half-heeled scar that went before. This hard, dry surface was of a bloody-black color, serrated by grievous cracks wherein the raw red flesh peeped forth. His skin garments were dirty and in tatters, and the fur of one side was singed and burned away, showing where he had lain upon his fire.

Malemute Kid pointed to where the sun-tanned hide had been cut away, strip by strip—the grim signature of famine.

"Who—are—you?" slowly and distinctly enunciated the Kid.

The man paid no heed.

"Where do you come from?"

"Yankee ship come down de ri-ib—er," was the quavering response.

"Don't doubt the beggar came down the river," the Kid said, shaking him in an endeavor to start a more lucid flow of talk.

But the man shrieked at the contact, clapping a hand to his side in evident pain. He rose slowly to his feet, half leaning on the table.

"She laughed at me—so—with the hate in her eye; and she—would—not—come."

His voice died away, and he was sinking back when Malemute Kid gripped him by the wrist, and shouted, "Who? Who would not come?"

"She, Unga. She laughed, and struck at me so, and so. And then—"

"Yes?"

"And then—"

"And then what?"

"And then he lay very still, in the snow, a long time. He is—still—in—the—snow."

The two men looked at each other helplessly.

"Who is in the snow?"

"She, Unga. She looked at me with the hate in her eye, and then—"

"Yes, yes."

"And then she took the knife, so; and once, twice—she was weak. . ."

After a little Malemute Kid is made to understand that the Indian had loved the Indian wife of a white man, had lured the twain out upon a trail in quest of gold, and had only returned to repay a grub-stake he owed, it being a question of honor with him

The exhausted head dropped upon the table; nor could Malemute Kid rouse it again.

"It's Ulysses," he said quietly, tossing the bag of dust on the table. "Guess it's all day with Axel Gunderson and the woman. Come on, let's get him between the blankets. He's Indian; he'll pull through, and tell a tale besides."

As they cut the garments from him, near his right breast could be seen two unhealed, hard-lipped knife thrusts.

After a young author has achieved a success—and The Son of the Wolf must be considered a distinct achievement—the question is, "And then?" Mr. London has it well within his power to do work that will count in his development of the short story. He no doubt knows his own powers better than anyone else. He will get out of the Kipling manner—although it is a good manner—soon enough. He will have to get out of it, of course. No one can afford to write in another man's manner for long. When he does get out of it his own personality will have a chance to be estimated. It is clear that he has an abundance of native strength, a strong dramatic sense, considerable imaginative powers, the ability to write simply and firmly, and other virtues. The reading public will be interested to see more of his work.

Mrs. M. E. M. Davis has written a little story of life in New Orleans entitled The Queen's Garden (Houghton, Mifflin Co., Boston), now upon this desk. The tale is poetic and has considerable charm; but it would not be called "strong" by many readers, either in characterization or dramatic interest. After all it would be a mad world that contained nothing but strong stories. The poetry of things "far off and dim in ages long ago" is very restful and soothing after the day's work is done. It helps to keep people sane. The hard, cold facts of life, the significant facts, crowd in mightily upon us from every side, and we need now and then to forget them in their baldness. We need these fresh cuttings from the old gardens of poetry to keep us from intellectual scurvy. The Queen's Garden tells of a young girl who comes to New Orleans to live with an aunt she has never seen. Her father was something of a poet; for before his death, when she was yet very small, he had told her a great many fairy tales of a certain wonderful garden. Noel arrives at her aunt's house in the midst of the yellow fever epidemic, and is at once placed in quarantine, as it were. She is allowed to see no one, but is given the freedom of her room and of the old garden. This garden proves to be the identical land of faery her father had described so minutely. There is a faery prince, too, who happens to be a newspaper man. While the prince and the princess are getting acquainted the old aunt is carried off by the scourge, leaving Noel alone in the world. Then the prince is stricken. Noel finds a wonderful secret passage from her father's description, and installs herself as nurse. When the doctor finds them she too has the fever. The old tale of faery had ended unhappily; but Noel and her prince are so fortunate as to recover; and of course as they love each other they marry, and unhappiness is no longer a guest in their good garden.

As Seen by Leila.

I HAVE come to the conclusion, Diary dear, that Cricket was a very industrious and energetic little person. Fancy for years writing a letter each week telling of the things one has been doing, without accomplishing anything. To me it is almost a sin. It certainly is a sin for me to have promised to tell you how things were going in her absence. There is nothing to tell. Everything in the social way is dead. Girls are now spending their time, so I have discovered, helping to make home miserable for papa and mama and brothers and small sisters, by being supremely bored. This is, I think, the time for a girl to develop a love affair. But then, of course, the younger set, if they fall in love, do it in a most precipitate manner, and before another season is passed will break it off if it has reached the engagement stage. Mama and I often wonder why it is young girls are so anxious to marry in their first season, and when they become a little older are so difficult to please and to get off their mother's hands. Of course, it must be the lack of development in the men. But I have said a great deal of that at other times, so will spare you now. I wonder what Cricket would find to interest you. Perhaps that there have been a number of theatre parties to the California to see the Neill Company. I do not care specially for Mr. Neill. He is an egotist. Here is a man who considers himself of such rare importance as to advertise his name alone on the boards—yes, his name alone, with a small picture of himself in each of his characters, surrounding a large picture of him as a nineteenth century young man. I anticipated a wonderful actor. Even Mansfield, and he was supposed to be the most selfish man on the stage, mentioned his cast in his advertisements. Theatre parties, all men and most girls really enjoy. It is so easy a manner of entertainment, and it does not make so much difference if one has not a congenial person beside him. The play absorbs most of his attention, and if there be a pretty girl on the stage—well, then, nothing matters.

A pretty general exodus to the country will begin with the middle of May. The Hagers, under the chaperonage of Mrs. Downey Harvey, are to go to Del Monte; the Morgans, Deans, Caseys, Miss Dillon, Boardmans, Houghtons and Sidney Smiths to San Rafael. The men of the family can go to town daily from San Rafael, Ross Valley, Sausalito and Belvedere; that accounts for the places being so popular. Mama and I shall go to Del Monte. There is no hotel of which I am so fond, and the table is so good there. Cricket and the "Ideal" have taken a house in San Rafael, so have Walter and Emily Hager Dean. It should be pretty gay over there, and were it not that I should be afraid that Cricket might engage in a small flirtation, and thus engender mama's and my unhappiness perhaps, I think I could be induced to spend a short time there.

Notwithstanding the fact that the engagement of Helen Woolworth and Count Pietro Macchi has been announced it is quite without foundation. I received a letter from Mrs. Woolworth the other day and she mentioned the rumor to me, but said there was no truth in it, and that Helen and she were just about to start for Lucerne. Rumors of engagements are just as prevalent in Europe as they are here, and I think do as little harm. Doctor and Mrs. A. H. Voorhies have announced the engagement of their daughter Leila Grantland to Lieutenant Guy Scott, son of Senator Nathan Scott of West Virginia. Leila is one of this year's debutantes. In fact one might easily say the belle of the buds of this season. She is a pretty, jolly, bright girl and quite able to cope with the difficulties of an army life.

Mr. Scott is almost a stranger here, so I have not much to say of him. He has however shown a great deal of judgment in the selection of a bride. The time for the marriage has not yet been set.

The only large affair that I am anticipating with pleasure is a big reception on May 17th, to Mrs. Collis P. Huntington, by Mrs. Homer King. I shall give you further particulars next week.

I do hope someone will do something this coming week so that I can be more interesting to you, Diary dear, for I muchly fear my effort is a failure.

The Indians had bound their captive to the stake, when the conventional happy thought struck the latter. "If you burn me," he explained, "the sun will be darkened tomorrow." "You will find," replied the Indian, "if you calculate the parallax to the forty-third decimal place, that the eclipse does not take place until the day after to-morrow." Saying which, for these simple children of the forest were all graduates of the government schools, they proceeded with their barbaric slaughter.—Detroit Journal.

Beauty's a Flower.

Youth's for an hour,
Beauty's a flower,
But love is the jewel that wins the world.

Youth's for an hour, an' the taste o' life is sweet.
Ailes was a girl that stepped on two bare feet.
In all my days I never seen the one as fair as she.
I'd have lost my life for Ailes, and she never cared for me.

Beauty's a flower, an' the days o' life are long,
There's little knowing who may live to sing another song,
For Ailes was the fairest, but another is my wife,
An' Mary—God be good to her!—is all I have in life.

What Are Club Cocktails?

"A MODERN ECSTASY" is a Shakespearian definition for a "Cocktail." "Kings it makes gods, and meaner creatures kings."

Wherever good livers are found, wherever conviviality exists, even to the most remote corners of the earth, the "CLUB COCKTAIL" reigns supreme as a fashionable drink.

The "CLUB COCKTAILS" never vary; they are always the same. The secret of their perfect blend is that they are kept six months before being drawn off and bottled.

"Cocktails" that are served over the bar do not contain these indispensable qualities.

A GERANIUM TRAGEDY.

GERANIUMS were Mary Ellen's fad. Just as a rich girl might take one corner of a conservatory for a miniature violet plantation or a fernery, Mary Ellen took the front window sill of the Casey home, overlooking Mulberry street's most select block. She had arranged eight species of her favorite flower in a row, raised from slips. Four had achieved the dignity of pots, while the others were still in the tomato-can preliminary stage, awaiting their development.

Three were scarlet, one a double variety that was the pride of Mary Ellen's heart. Then there was a verbena geranium with its ornate fragrant leaf and a darling little pink baby that was coming on finely. The others were yet possibilities. Mary Ellen had bought them as a marked-down lot from a street peddler who gave them to her for a song on account of the broken-off flower-stems.

Mary Ellen worked in a big factory uptown. Before six, each morning, she went to her work in a Second avenue car and came home by the same route each night. Her life was extremely monotonous, hard and without color except for her two joys—the geranium farm and Cheesey Cummiskey.

It cannot be said that Cheesey Cummiskey resembled Mary Ellen's other fad in the least. There was nothing floral in his personality. He was the assistant barkeeper in a Mulberry street saloon, and mornings, as Mary Ellen passed on her way to work, he was engaged with a hose and a mop and a broom in washing off various gratings, rubber mats and bric-a-brac that made part of the interior furnishing of the Mulberry street wet-goods emporium where he worked.

Mary Ellen, who in her way was dainty and sweet as her flowers, blushed rosily at the sight of Cheesey's remarkably fine, white arms from which the sleeves of his sweater were rolled back almost to the shoulder. If Mary Ellen had ever visited the galleries abroad she would have compared him mentally to a Greek gladiator done in marble. As it was, she only thought inarticulately that he was as strong as she was little and weak. So she blushed red as the big double scarlet bloom on the window at home. Cheesey appreciatively said, "Ah dere!" And thus the romance, so nearly tragic, dawned.

In time, they spoke to each other in the light badinage of the Mulberry street social code. Cheesey chirruped as Mary Ellen tripped by and she very properly told him to gwan and give her none of his funny bizness.

"A-h-h-h, fergit it," said Cheesey, leaning on his mop socially barring her way. "Will youse come to the Friendly Sons Moonlight Soiree on de eight?"

"What do youse take me fer?" said Mary Ellen indignantly. "I'm no pick up!"

"A-h-h-h!" said Cheesey, "don't I know who youse are? Don't yer father, Mickey Casey, come in here every Satu'day? Ask him who Cheesey Cummiskey is, dat's all!"

In this simple yet circumspect way Mary Ellen acquired Cheesey Cummiskey as a steady. Cheesey with his sweater sleeves was statuesque, but after working hours on his nights off he was resplendent. When he swaggered down the block to Mary Ellen's, silence fell on groups at doors and it was whispered:

"There goes Mary Ellen Casey's gen'l'man friend."

The girls in the block began to set their caps for him in ingenuous Mulberry street style, and for the first time Cheesey experienced the delightful thrill of a genuine lady killer. For Cheesey, until no , had had no dalliance with the tender passion. His ambition had been in the sporting line to the exclusion of any weakness for femininity. He was wont to swing Indian clubs and punch a bag in the cellar of the saloon, secretly fitting himself for an entrance to the profession he worshipped.

But Mary Ellen's eyes, mutely breathing her admiration for him, had touched some vulnerable spot in his makeup. Her pale prettiness and grace were in such contrast to most of the young women in Cheesey's set that he told his associates at the various picnics and balls to which he escorted her that she was a lady, and that the first man who forgot that fact would be jabbed in the slats by him, Cheesey. And the young men, cognizant of Cheesey's mucular arms, desisted.

Now Mary Ellen had her limitations. She was, as the young ladies at the factory said, too damn pertickler to live. She objected to a great many things that are considered strictly up to date in low as well as high circles, and was even called a stuck-up thing by some of the girls, notably Liz Roscoe, who gave imitations of Mary Ellen's prim behavior at balls and mixed-ale parties to which she was bidden as Cheesey's girl.

Mary Ellen had not been out long. That was easily seen as she returned from various functions in late horse cars. When every other girl's head rested in holy slumber on the chest of her escort, Mary Ellen alone sat stiffly upright, allowing Cheesey to hold her hand only under protest. But as the boys said, she had him dead and he only seemed to wax more constant under her harsh treatment of him. That is, until Liz Roscoe began to guy him openly, at the same time luring him with an invitation in her bold black eyes. At first he laughed at her, then he swore and in each case she got back at him in like manner with interest.

Liz Roscoe and her married sister lived on the floor below the Caseys. On the nights that Cheesey called on Mary Ellen Miss Roscoe was wont to array herself in her best and to plant herself at the door, where she greeted him with jeers, Cheesey chasing her on these [illegible] hall screaming with laughter, all of which penetrated to the floor above where Mary Ellen waited for Cheesey, her eyes upon the clock. Mary was one of those girls who do not believe in entertaining one's steady on the doorstep.

Not content with this strategy, Liz Roscoe now began to lie in wait for Cheesey when he left the Casey home about ten o'clock. On these occasions Mary Ellen and Cheesey came out upon to landing to utter their farewells. And to the ears of the girl waiting in the dimly lit hall below were borne sounds that indicated that Mary Ellen was chary of her caresses, more so than Cheesey wished and again Liz Roscoe twitted him at the foot of the stairs, until one night, maddened by her fun-making, his chase through the hall was successful and Mary Ellen, waiting to hear him leave, learned that Miss Roscoe's ethics as to the extent of a gen'l'man friend's farewells were practically limitless.

Next day Mary Ellen went by Cheesey in the golden summer sunrise, passing by on the other side. Had he been a symbolist or a problem play crank, he would have likened her to the Spirit of God, whose ministrations he had forfeited by his own evil deeds. As it was, he merely whistled through his teeth.

On the next night off, Liz Roscoe's black gypsy eyes met him at the door. This ti there was no jeer in them but a tender appeal to his memory. Cheesey gave one glance up to the geranium crowned window above and loitered, intoxicated with his triumph. Liz Roscoe in her red shirt-waist was like a full-blown rose compared to the pale, timid little girl upstairs. Up there Mary Ellen's heart was breaking, as girl's hearts break at 18. She had felt that this night would mark a crisis. Cheesey would appear as usual. She would greet him freezingly until he fully explained and promised to atone for his faitlessness by taking no notice of the siren that lurked in the shadows below.

But Cheesey was only human and he had an idea that Mary Ellen would weaken and come down. Or he would break away and go up later. He counted not on the arts by which girls with black eyes may enchain captives in their glance. At the window crouched Mary Ellen, kneeling by her beloved plants. They were all that were left her now. The bitterness of an Octavia who beholds her Antony in the arms of a Cleopatra consumed her. Hot childlike tears came to her eyes. What a humiliation! Before the whole block! And their voices came up to her.

"Why don't ye go up and see yer girl Cheesey?" asked Liz.

"A-h-h-h! Wot'er ye' givin' us?" said Cheesey.

"I've no use fer ye," said Liz with her lips, while her eyes said that she had.

"Fergit it," said Cheesey.

"I've got a gen'lman fren' of me own!" said Liz. "I've no use fer Mary Ellen Casey's steady!"

"Who said I wuz her steady?" said Cheesey.

"A-h-h-h-h-h-h! Don't every one know ye're dead stuck on her!" said Liz with a touch of passion in her voice and a flash of her eyes that conquered him.

"Fergit it!" he said; "she's too dead slow! Dat's straight! I tell ye, Liz, she don't travel in de same class wit youse! Youse is de real ting! She's a gilly!"

Just then from above, a bolt like that which struck Pygmalion blind when his eyes gazed upon the forbidden beauty of Galatea, came an avalanche of earth, flower pots and loaded tomato cans, together with geraniums in bloom and otherwise. They were aimed with precision and a certain smooth sweeping motion that sent them in a swift imperceptible succession directly at one mark—the head of Cheesey Cummiskey.

He fell stunned and bleeding to the steps, Liz Roscoe screaming with her hair full of earth and double scarlet geranium blossoms. In less than it takes to tell, a crowd, a cop, an ambulance came.

Later that night, a pale little girl was at Cheesey Cummiskey's cot in Bellevue, her arms about his neck and his still gladiator-like arms clasping her as she whispered a terrible confession, between an interval in the bandages about his head. And Cheesey's eyes, looking out mystically and orientally from under his white-bound brows, suddenly comprehended hitherto unsuspected depths and heights in the personality of Mary Ellen, and forgiving her, as men always do for the crime of loving him too much, whispered gently:

"A-h-h-h-! Fergit it—Mame—fergit it!"

1. "Arise, fair sun, and kill the envious moon!"

2. It is my lady! O! it is my love!"

3. "O! now begone; more light and light it grows!"

4. "Parting is such sweet sorrow!"

5. A change of hair!

6. "No more serenading for me!"

The reader of this paper will be pleased to learn that there is at least one dreaded disease that science has been able to cure in all its stages, and that is Catarrh. Hall's Catarrh Cure is the only positive cure known to the medical fraternity. Catarrh being a constitutional disease, requires a constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure is taken internally, acting directly upon the blood and mucous surfaces of the system, thereby destroying the foundation of the disease, and giving the patient strength by building up the constitution and assisting nature in doing its work. The proprietors have so much faith in its curative powers that they offer One Hundred Dollars for any case that it fails to cure. Send for list of testimonials.

AT THE THEATERS

The only thing lacking to make a typical howling melodrama of "The Great Diamond Robbery" running at the Alcazar this week, is a villain. The play runs to villainesses. All the bad men are only mildly bad but the good ones are the limit. That was where Edwin T. Emery got in his strong work.

It seems that Miss Everett in the leading part had stolen Count Garkiardoff's diamonds, married Mr. Bulford and comes to New York, where she poisons her husband, who is about to discover her guilt, and then fastens the crime on Frank Kennet, played by Mr. Emery.

Then comes a series of bewildering complications, in which everyone in the Alcazar Company is mixed. Geo. Webster as Dick Brummage the detective who finally rights everything is the star of the play. He is right in his element in a show like this one and has the audience with him from start to finish. Laura Crews does a good "tough girl" stunt, and Marie Howe as the second villainess, Madam Rosenbaum, is first class. Ernest Hastings makes a very good Tammany politician, but as usual has trouble with his lines.

Taken all in all "The Great Diamond Robery" is one of the Alcazar's best performances and should be good for a run.

Mr. Neill's impersonation of Baron de Chevrial in "A Parisian Romance" fully justifies the opinion that it takes a great actor to make a play like this a success. It is only the quality and manner of Mansfield that transform a repulsive monstrosity such as the Baron de Chevrial into a character worth seeing. Neill is strong in parts. He is remarkably versatile and will in time be an actor of much note. Neill's instant grasp of the portent of the roles in which we have seen him this season and his facile comprehension of how best to imitate the original actors of different plays is a proof, if proof is needed.

Irene Everett, at the Alcazar Theatre.

Benjamin Harvard as Henri de Targy was in one of his very best roles. His stage presence is good. Not one action throughout the performance detracted from the delicacy of his rendition. It is difficult, too, to play the part of the perfect son and martyr husband. Edythe Chapman as Marrel, the wife, was excellent. She did not use any of the outlandish or extravagant mannerisms so frequently given in such a character. Julia Dean as Rose Gwin was sympathetic as usual, and what was more, looked exceedingly pretty especially in her black ballet costume.

Next week "An American Citizen" is to be put on. Neill will be better in this for his role is the comedian.

At the head of the Orpheum bill is Ezra Kendall, who comes with a collection of entirely new stuff. The Newsboys Quintette is another old favorite with local theater goers. Louise Gunning is a little Scotch girl who has won a world-wide reputation by her simple ballads. She is pretty, a good singer and has the advantage of having been brought up in the land o' cakes. Charles Ulrick performs acrobatic feats with a huge barrel. Kleist Brothers are all-round musicians and their act, in which they introduce a back ground of black art, is said to be original and entertaining. Milton and Dollie Nobles will present "Why Walker Reformed." They will be assisted by Miss Eva Westcott. The holdovers are: Mark Sullivan, W. E. Bates, and the biograph with a series of new views.

"The Evil Eye," which has filled the Columbia, has another week's run. It is a spectacular play with a good German comedian, a few pretty girls and some clever scenic effects. It is intended primarily to please the children and succeeds in this. The week following comes the great feature of the present theatrical season—John Drew and company in "The Tyranny of Tears," a play new to us, and one of the greatest comedies written in this country. This engagement is limited to a week.

"Maister of Wood Barrow," by Jerome K. Jerome, is the Alcazar bill for the coming week. It is a romantic drama which used to figure in the repertoire of E. N. Sothern, and a fairly strong one.

Next week, the Neill Company will present another Goodwin play—"An American Citizen" by Madelaine Lucette Ryley. The piece has been somewhat pruned and improved since Goodwin used it. This is a new play with the Neills and if it "takes" it will be added to their repertoire.

"The Wizard of the Nile" seems out to beat the record-breaking run of "The Idol's Eye." Already, the receipts excel those of the former show for the same number of weeks.

"My Lady Slavey" is the next attraction at the Grand. Arthur Wooley, really the best comedian of last season's Morosco Company, has returned and reinforces this company at a point where they were very weak.

Paloma Schramm, the child pianist, assisted by her younger sister Karla, gave a most interesting concert at Sherman and Clay Hall on Thursday.

It is rumored that Coquelin may possibly include San Francisco in his coming American tour.

The farce-comedy company which is to hold the boards at the California this summer is probably the strongest organization of the kind ever gathered in the West.

Man born in the wilds of Kentucky is of feud days and easy virtue. He fisheth, fiddleth and fighteth all the days of his life. He shunneth water as a mad dog and drinketh much whisky.

He riseth even from his cradle to see the scalp of his grandsire's enemy, and bringeth home in his carcass the ammunition of his neighbor's wife's uncle's father-in-law, who avengeth the deed.

Yea, verily, his life is uncertain and he knoweth not the hour when he may be fired hence.

He goeth on a journey "half shot" and cometh back on a shutter, shot.

He rises in the night to let the cat out, and it taketh nine doctors to pick the buckshot from his person.

He goeth forth in joy and gladness and cometh back in scraps and fragments.

He calleth his fellow man a liar and getteth himself filled with scrap iron, even to the fourth generation.

He emptieth a demijohn into himself and a shotgun into his enemy, and his enemy's son lieth in wait on election day, and lo, the coroner ploweth up a 40-acre field to bury the remains of that man.—Manila American.

Would appear,
I, who haven't got a sou,
Very softly say to you,

Will it, dear?"

"There is but one Napa Soda, and that is Jackson's." This sentence has been [illegible]sively quoted at the bars and other places since it first appeared in the [illegible] several weeks ago. At that time the fact was mentioned that the courts, in protection of the public stomach and a legitimate business, had decided that there was only one "Napa," and that Jackson's, bottled at the Napa Soda Springs, and that all imitations were against the law and their manufactures liable to heavy penalty. Since then it has been safe for a man to order Napa Soda at the cheapest bar as well as at the swellest clubs. Imitation may be the sincerest form of flattery, but there is sometimes too much of a good thing.

A DODGE THAT FAILED.—During the fighting at Spion Kop, General Hart, commanding the Irish Brigade, discovered a soldier sitting on a rock a long way from the firing-line. "Good afternoon, my man!" he said, "What are you doing here?" "Sir," replied the soldier, "an officer told me to stop here, sir." "Oh! Why?" "I'm a third-class shot, sir." "Dear me," said the general after some reflection—"that's an awful pity, because, you see, you'll have to get quite close to the Boers to do any good! Come along with me, and I'll find you a nice place;" and a mournful procession trailed off towards the most advanced skirmishers.

WHY THE JANITOR WAS ABSENT.—A few days ago, the janitor in one of the colored churches in Cleveland was absent on Sunday morning, and the pastor complained that the house was cold and cheerless. In the midst of the minister's criticism, one of the members tiptoed his way to the pulpit, and whispered in the preacher's ears these words, loud enough to be heard by the congregation: "The janitor was arrested last night while stealing coal." Not another word was said on the subject.

x

A FINER DISTINCTION.—Dr. Stubb's, Bishop of Chester, was discussing evolution at a reception, much to the delight of a group of ladies who surrounded him. The current of the Bishop's remarks was broken in on by a pompous young gentleman whs stood by. "It comes to this, Doctor, the only distinction I can see between a man and an ape is that the man can speak and the ape can't." Dr. Stubbs looked at him and added: "Don't you think, perhaps, that there is also this distinction, that the man knows when to ho'd his tongue and the ape doesn't?"

x

A FAMILY TRAIT.—The other evening, while a young San Franciscan was calling, with his little sister, at a residence on Pacific avenue, the little girl was vigorously embracing one of the young ladies of the house. Some one remarked of the little tot: "How very affectionate she is!" "Yes, so like her brother!" responded the young lady, unthinkingly. And then she wondered why every one laughed.

x

AN EASY MEANS OF LIVELIHOOD—During a committee-meeting preceding the late Ecumenical Conference in New York, a speaker was dwelling upon the cheapness of human life in China. He dwelt especially upon the fact that, when a Chinaman is condemned to death, he may always find a substitute to die in his place. "And," he added, "I have heard that many poor fellows earn their living by acting as substitutes in that manner!"

x

YOUTH AND VIRTUE.—A widow in Yorkshire, commissioning the local stonemason to erect a tombstone, stated that she wished to have one that would do credit to her late husband and herself. "I don't want nothing out of th' way, but handsome and simple," she explained. "'William Wilson, died, October 4th, 1896, aged eighty-five. The good die young.'"

x

KITCHENER ON PEACE.—Before going to the Cape, General Kitchener was interviewed on the subject of the peace conference. "What do you think of the prospect of disarmament and universal peace?" he was asked. "I don't think of it." "Then do you think that there is any chance of a general European war?" "Well," answered the general, "this confounded peace has been so violent that it can't last much longer."

x

LONG-WINDED.—When General Butler was in Congress, he once arose and gently complained that the member who was occupying the floor was transgressing the limit of debate. "Why, General," said the speaker, "you agreed to divide the time with me." "I know it," said Butler, "but I did not agree to divide eternity with you."

x

AN IGNORANT PRAYER.—A Scotch minister from a large town once visited and preached in a rural parish, and was asked to pray for rain. He did so, and the rain came in floods and destroyed some of the crops, whereupon one elder remarked to another. "This comes o' intrusting sic a request to a meenister who isna acquentit wi' agriculture."

x

MISPLACED SYMPATHY.—A Birmingham woman, wife of an army reserve man, was being sympathized with because her husband had been sent to the Transvaal. "Oh, it i'm ain't 'im troubled about," said she, "It's them pore Boers! Bill's such a terror when he starts."

EVENTS CURRENT.

The War in South Africa.

On both lines of advance—that through Orange Free State and that through Natal—the British movement on the Transvaal Republic is well under way, and has been most successful. Roberts has broken the Boer line which was believed to be stiffening on the borders of their own country. He has passed and taken the important town of Kronstadt and is moving forward with all the speed possible to an army so great as his own. Buller, on the Natal border, has cleared out the region around Ladybrand without much trouble, and is at Belmont, the point where White sustained his first defeat in the retreat on Ladysmith. The fighting has, all along, been very spiritless on the Boer part, and gives verification to the assertion of the English correspondents that the backbone of Boer opposition is broken. Many signs point in that direction. The number of desertions have been large; there is known to be dissension between the Orange Free State people and the Transvaal Boers; a party in the Volksraad, the same faction which opposed the war in the beginning, is known to be in favor of peace proposals. In addition to this, the Associated Press reports have a story which may or may not be true; it is given for what it is worth. It is asserted that a correspondent, who happened to know Dutch, overheard the Boer envoys now on their way to the United States discussing the war and the political situation, that they were very despondent, and that they admitted intervention by the United States as their only hope. However, the interest in the week's events has centered not in the advance of the main British army nor the hope of intervention nor the prospects of peace, but in the plucky siege and defense of the little town of Mafeking. The end of the siege, one way or other, is close at hand. When Buller advanced, he dispatched a column to the relief, it being the first attempt made since early in the war. The Boers seem to have anticipated this move by pressing the attack with all possible energy, hoping to take the post before the relieving force could reach it. Twice has rumor reported the town relieved and once it has had it taken, yet these reports have been refuted. All that is certain is that the relief has worked up to a point within thirty-two miles of the place and is there opposing a Boer position of unknown strength, that Baden-Powell and his men repulsed a heavy Boer assault last week, with considerable loss to themselves, and that the British hold the place. But they cannot hold it unrelieved much longer on a diet of bran and horse-meat, and the decisive battle over this point is close at hand.

Naval Appropriations and German Intentions.

The Naval Appropriation Bill, providing for a number of expenditures all looking toward a great increase of our national sea-power, has passed the Senate after several days of warm debate. The bill provides for the construction of the new and powerful battleships and cruisers upon the lines laid down by the Secretary of the Navy, and makes the initial appropriations for the purpose. An important clause deals with the question of armor which has vexed our naval constructors considerably during the past few years. This section is, therefore, aimed at the more or less mythical armor trust. It provides that the Secretary of the Navy shall pay not more than $445 per ton for the best armor procurable. Failing in obtaining this price, he is to pay not more than $545 for the armor of the most important battleships, including the Ohio, Maine and Missouri, and proceed at once to the erection of a government armor plant, keeping the cost under $4,000,000. Another important item is the authorization for the purchase of five Holland sub-marine torpedo boats. A significant undercurrent of feeling running through the whole debate on the subject was the fear of Germany and her plans regarding the South American countries. Never once was this openly expressed, yet so strongly did it influence the feeling of our legislators that it is understood to have been the tacit argument which won the Senate. But although Germany was not named, a possibility that we may soon be called upon to defend the Monroe Doctrine was hinted at more than once. Said Senator Lodge of Massachusetts: "I am by no means convinced that some European power, perhaps one of those whose navy is just now receiving such a rapid increase, may not test the Monroe Doctrine and that we may find ourselves called upon to protect Brazil or some other South American state from invasion." In line with this, is the recent speech of Secretary Root at a New York banquet: "No intelligent man can read the signs of the times today and not realize that the hour is coming—and coming before many years—when we American people will be forced either to abandon the Monroe Doctrine or else fight for it. And unless greater wisdom and diligence in legislation is displayed in the future than has prevailed in the past, that time is likely to arise and find us in a state of unpreparedness." There is no doubt that Germany is the power referred to and that Brazil and the Argentine Republic are the countries where it is feared that the Monroe Doctrine will be violated. This undercurrent of feeling had its effect even on the armor question. We are now dependent on Krupp, a source of supply which would be closed in the event of a German-American war.

Opening of the American Pavilion at Paris.

In spite of the agitation raised by certain churches in the United States against Sunday opening of the American exhibits in the Paris Exhibition, the National Pavilion was opened formerly on Sunday, May 12. The inauguration was made the occasion of impressive ceremonies, attended by the American Diplomatic Corps, by the French managers of the Exposition and by all the American visitors in Paris. Great crowds thronged the building and all the approaches. Commissioner Ferdinard W. Peck, on behalf of the United States, handed over the building and the symbolic keys; M. Alfred Pichard, Commissioner General of the exposition, responded on behalf of France, and Sousas's band, imported for the occasion, concluded the ceremony with a concert. The Pavilion is one of the largest in the avenue of the foreign buildings, but is generally considered to be inferior to the others architecturally, thus marking the low state of our national art sense compared with that of the nations of Europe. On the other hand, our exhibit taken as a whole, is, both in quality and and quantity, far and away ahead of that of any other nation outside of France. In this exposition, exhibits are arranged by classes instead of by countries, as was the case at Chicago. It cannot, therefore, be seen grouped and as a whole, but it dominates several sections of the big Fair. It is particularly strong in the departments of mines, horticulture and forestry. One feature which is a matter of self-congratulation to all good Americans is the promptness with which our part of the work was done. The Exposition as a whole was far from ready on the day of the general opening, yet every American exhibit stood in place on that day—a fact noted and publicly commended by President Loubet.

Chances for the Canal Bill.

The Nicaragua Canal Bill has been favorably reported in the Senate after a hard fight, and action should be taken inside another week. It stands about an even chance of passing this session. The Republican "steering committee" is understood to be against action at this season, but a strong Republican and Democratic faction are for immediate passage. The Senate is unquestionably in an awkward position, for the reason that as part of the treaty-making power it has advised and consented to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, which prohibits the United States from constructing an isthmian canal. It is true that this was half a century since, and that the validity of the treaty is disputed, but the Senate is nevertheless responsible for the acts of the Senate of fifty years ago. On the other hand, the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty, in its unratified state, presents no barrier. Hepburn, father of the bill, has shown that, although the much-abused agreement was not ratified, yet the bill is in accordance with its provisions and Great Britain can, therefore, have no valid objection. As it stands now, the measure has nothing to say, for or against, about the tangled question of fortification. Let it be understood that the passage of this bill, should it go through at this session and receive the Presidential signature, will not settle the question nor assure the construction and possession of the canal. Far from it. The Hay-Pauncefote matter must be settled. The two Central American Republics concerned must give their consent. The bill is mainly useful in that it shows to the European nations our intentions in the matter and assures for us pre-emption of the right to construct the waterway and hold the chief claim therein.

Two Important Street-Car Strikes.

The past ten days has witnessed extensive strikes among the employees of the street car tines of Kansas City and St. Louis. In the former, the employers have won easily, and the strikers are shut out completely, in the latter, the trouble still continues. The original ground of difference in both cases was a demand for higher wages. In Kansas City, the Federal courts issued an injunction preventing the strikers and the unions from interfering with traffic. The companies thereupon put non-union men to work, and traffic went on as usual, the strikers failing in their efforts to keep the new force away from the cars by moral suasion. At St. Louis, the situation is more complicated. There, the Transit Company, the main tramway system, experienced the first strike, all conductors and motormen going out on May 8. A sympathetic strike followed on the Suburban line. Within two days, ninety per cent of the street-car men of the city had walked out, and hardly a car was running. An attempt to send out crews of non-union men on the first two days resulted in heavy rioting with two deaths and many serious injuries. The police then took a hand and guarded the lines to prevent blockades and violence. In this manner, many cars were gotten through their usual routes in the daytime, although traffic was and is entirely suspended during nights and Sundays, and business in all lines is pretty well tied up. So serious has the situation become that the governor of Missouri is taking part in the fruitless conferences between the labor leaders and the companies. Neither side gives any sign of yielding and matters are at a standstill, although the companies have a little the best of it, because they are running their cars in the face of the strikers' declaration that they would "tie up every line and keep 'em tied." It may be noticed in passing, that street-car strikes have come to be more common than any other form of labor trouble. The reason is doubtless that the dependence of cities on tramway traffic gives infinite opportunities for mischief, and leaves city business at the mercy of the unions.

Clark of Montana Springs a Sensation.

A new move was made last week in the fight of Senator-Elect Clark of Montana for a right to his seat. This week, the celebrated case, which has dragged out its length during the whole session, was about to be reported adversely by the Committee on Privileges and Elections. Clark got wind of this, and forestalled action by handing in a resignation of his claims. It was supposed that he had given up the fight in despair; far from it. The Governor of Montana, Robert B. Smith, was absent in California at the time, and Lietenant-Governor Spriggs was acting as Executive. In Montana, the regular parties exist in name only; everyone in politics there is a Daly man or a Clark man. Smith belongs to the former faction, Spriggs to the latter. One day after Clark's resignation, Spriggs, in his capacity as acting Governor, declared the Senatorial office vacant and appointed Clark to the place. The Senate's reason for refusing the seat was the proved fact that bribery had been employed by the Montana claimant in winning his own state legislature. Therefore, they argued, the appointment of an acting Governor, made, presumably, through no use of corruption-funds, stood a chance of holding. The chance seems remote, however. The Committee on Elections will hardly sanction credentials obtained in so suspicious a manner, especially since the case has been so widely advertised through the sensational press.

The Populist Conventions.

The two wings of the Populist party held their national conventions last week at Sioux Falls, S. D. The Fusionist wing, which represents the main strength of the dying party, nominated William Jennings Bryan for President, and Charles A. Towne of Michigan for Vice-President. The "middle-of-the-road" wing selected Wharton Barker of Pennsylvania and Ignatious Donnelly of Minnesota for first and second places on their ticket. Bryan's nomination by the Fusion wing was a foregone conclusion; the real fight was over the vice-presidential nomination. A large minority were for deferring the nomination for this office, leaving it to a special committee which should name the man after a conference with the Democratic and Silver Republican leaders. This would seem to be the wiser plan, since the interests of the Fusion Populists and the Democrats are now identical; it was doubtless the fear of jobbery in a selected committee which prompted the convention to vote it down. The final nomination was made only after a struggle lasting several hours. Towne won on a compromise. It is understood that Towne is willing to withdraw in favor of the successful candidate at the Democratic convention, providing the matter can be adjusted with the party. In the "unadulterated" wing, there was more trouble. Barker and Donnelly had been chosen by initiative and referendum of the whole party in 1896, but they were strongly opposed in the convention, Howard of Alabama making the strong fight for first place. It was only when the straight-laced faction of this straight-laced division of the Populist party threatened to bolt in case their favorite theory was turned down, that the rank and file yielded. The two platforms are, of course, a mass of straight comdemnation of whatever is. The Fusion people begin by "roasting" the new currency bill, and make the usual demand for 16 to 1 coinage. Further they ask for government ownership, condemn trusts and imperialism, for both of which they hold the McKinley administration responsible, and extend sympathy to the Boers. The platform also denounces the use of troops in Idaho, declares against the importation of contract laborers, indorses municipal ownership of public utilities. It further declares for election of Senators by direct vote, denounces the use of injunctions in labor troubles and indorses the pension system. The Middle-of-the-Road wing rather slights silver and the other "issues of 1900" and takes up the time declaring its favorite Socialistic theories—initiative and referendum, public ownership, single tax, paper money, income tax, popular election of Senators, Federal Judges, and popular and not electorial vote for President and Vice-President.

Editorial Comment.

Pathos and Bathos.

ONE of the most discouraging facts that confront those who take an intelligent interest in the up-building of organized society and the reformation of those habits and institutions that exercise an evil effect upon human nature, is the waste of force, among those who are earnest and well meaning, through the support of fake agitations that are often used as a cloak by those who are seeking the attainment of sinister purposes, or are freak sensations of the new style of the newspaper press-work that has come into vogue, or are mere ebullitions of gross, though honest stupidity. Among the latter class must be ranged the agitation that has smouldered in certain well-meaning circles for about two years past against the use of birds, feathers as an adjunct to the adornment of ladies hats and bonnets. The basis of the agitation has been laid along humanitaiian lines. It is in the nature of a protest against what the protestants declare to be the brutal and unnecessary slaughter of "the little feathered songsters," in order to supply the demand of the millinery market. The agitation excited a momentary comment but it fell flat in the end. It fell flat because it was not based upon an intelligent understanding of the evil it was designed to correct. Though still-born, however, it has had sufficient political influence to cause a bill to be introduced into Congress (which Congress has no authority to pass) making it a crime to use the plumage of birds as trimming for hats or bonnets. This measure has had the advantage of the support of that strabismical-minded statesman, Senator Hoar, who could see no wrong in throttling the political life out of the weak but kindly Kanaka of Hawaii, but who, metaphorically, weeps over our attitude toward the ferocious Filipino who has made war upon our soldiers and flag. Senator Hoar recently made a speech in favor of the propending bill. In the course of that speech he became pathetic over the sad case of "the little feathered songsters." This provoked a forewoman in a large flower and feather factory to turn his pathos into bathos in this fashion:

"As a matter of fact, manufactured feathers are made from the plumage of edible birds and fowl—that is to say, when birds and fowl, such as pigeons, chickens, turkeys, geese, pheasants, etc., have been killed for eating purposes, their plumage is plucked and made up by deft hands into the handsome ornaments that adorn the headgear of woman."

But even if it were true that the supply of the millinery market requires the destruction of large numbers of small birds that are valueless for any other purpose, a sound basis for the pending bill or the hysterical agitation out of which it has grown would still be wanting. Man, after all, is but an animal, the maintenance of whose life and the promotion of whose comfort will, so long as this world continues to exist, make the destruction of the life of the lower animals, and of the birds of the air, and of the fishes of the water a necessity. The "humanity" which, while complacently picking the remains of a lamb chop from its teeth, goes to a meeting to protest against the killing of a small bird for the sake of the plumage, is of the bogus variety. That lamb would still be innocently gambolling on the hillside if the market created by the protestant's appetite had not caused the butchers to cut its throat. True, in the form of chops, its body has served a useful purpose for man. So will the plumage of the little bird. It is true, also, that the ladies can get along very well without bird plumages upon their heads, but so could man exist without devouring lamb chops. After all, man differs but little from a tiger except that the latter does his own butchering. So did man in the good old days when he lived in a cave in the woods and slew with his own hand the animals he ate and the skins he wore. Since then he has progressed. He has become too civilized and too refined and too dillettante to do his own butchering; but he has not become too civilized or too refined or too dilettante to devour the hot birds and beefsteaks and roasts that others have butchered for him, or to pay for those things with money that he has obtained by almost squeezing the life blood out of his fellow man and fellow woman.

Philanthropic and humanitarian "movements" of the kind which is backing this measure in behalf of "the little feathered songster" are almost always as illogical and hysterical as they are impracticable and uncalled for. A marked illustration of this was presented about eight years ago when one of the yellow journals, for the sake of a freak sensation, and taking as its text the report of a pigeon shooting match that had been made a "society function" at Del Monte, shed crocodile tears in large quantities over the brutality of killing poor, innocent pigeons for pleasure. The mere fact that there is no more brutality in shooting down pigeons that have just been released from a trap than there is in shooting down ducks, snipe, etcetera, that have just been flushed from their feeding places in the marshes, was a matter that cut no figure with the yellow journalists who had espoused the cause of the poor pigeon. They were not taking what Mr. Huntington would have termed "high ground" and opposing, as the vegetarians do, all destruction of life for the benefit and gratification of either man's appetite or his amusement. Their agitation attempted to establish nothing farther than that shooting pigeons for amusement, and as a method of demonstrating superiority of marksmanship, was cruel. To kill partridges in the fall stubble was left where it always had been—a justifiable exhibition of man's power as the Lord of Creation. Fishing, too, was left in its old place as the most innocent and kindly of all field sports; yet the angler who draws a fish from its native stream and places it in his basket submits that fish to death by a slow torture that rivals the fabled agonies of the Spanish inquisition. Senator Hoar and the other old women who are crying over "the little feathered songster," and the yellow journalists who were crying over the poor pigeon, should bear in mind that there is only one logical basis upon which their contentions can be supported, and that is by accepting the theories of the vegetarians and opposing all willful destruction of animal life as unnecessary and cruel, and the use of flesh for diet as unhealthy and little less revolting than cannibalism. Senator Hoar no doubt means well, but so long as the world is ful of real evils that need reformation, it seems like a pity that he should join Don Quixote in tilting at innocent windmills.

Municipal Ownership.

SHOULD a municipality own and operate street railways, waterworks, gasworks and the like? Equally clever men have answered this question affirmatively and negatively, each giving equally clever reasons for their conclusions. If you would deal intelligently with this problem, you must first determine to your own satisfaction whether or not it is a wise plan to fasten the doctrine of Paternalism upon our government. If you concede the principle to be right and its application wise, then you must concede that, in principle, the government should engage in the manufacturing and sale of flour, for all men use flour; in the manufacture and sale of salt, for all peoples use salt; in the manufacture and sale of clothing, for no civililized people go naked. The list of enterprises in which the government might thus engage is limited only by the wants of man. "But this is ridiculous" you may say. It is only a few years ago that most men declared public ownership of any kind ridiculous. The principle which approves the ownership of "public utilities" ought to approve—and if we take the first step, will eventually prevail—in all private undertakings that deal with the great body of the people. The socialist who rails against that modern commercial giant the Trust, fails to recognize in those vast combinations of wealth and energy, conducted under one management, the first step toward government ownership in their respective lines. The merchant of today, who carelessly gives adherence to "municipal ownership of public utilities," and quite as carelessly pronounces it a "good thing" does not look far into the future. We are drifting toward Socialism and Mobocraby. The growth of Populism marks the progress of discontent with the constitution and all that makes our government permanent and secure. The false and misleading cry demanding the "Election of Senators by the direct vote of the people" has grown to include the President, the Vice-President, the judges of the United States Supreme Court and lesser federal officers, and so sure as night follows day it will soon include our ambassadors, and consuls to foreign countries. But even after you have accepted Municipal ownership of water works to be a "good thing" you will not have settled the question, except in the abstract. You must institute a new investigation and come to a fresh conclusion before you can safely apply the theory to a particular case. You would scarcely advocate the placing of new powers, added burdens, and graver responsibilities upon a community that had repeatedly returned public officers who had been derelict in their duty, dishonest, corrupt and utterly incapable of administering the simple and usual affairs of American municipal life.

It is not enough to say "Municipal ownership is a good thing" and then proceed to apply it indiscriminately to every community in the land as a panacea for its political ills. The immense municipal storage dam that recently broke, down in Texas, and resulted in the destruction of so much life and property, was a wretched piece of municipal mismanagement. Corrupt public servants had erected a flimsy structure that gave way when put to the test. You have no insurance of cheaper light, because of municipal ownership. The rumor is current that the municipal electric light plant in Alameda is a miserable and costly fiasco. True, these two instances of failure selected at haphazard from a greater number do not damn either the theory or the position, nor would the citation of a hundred municipal successes along the same line prove the wisdom of municipal ownership. The instances of failure and success set side by side do prove, pretty effectually, as any half way sensible advocate of Socialism must admit, that the theory of Government ownership will not "work" in practice unless all of the surrounding circumstances are in perfect harmony.

These harmonious surroundings must embrace a voting class that is honest in itself, vigilant in public affairs and openly and actively arrayed against dishonesty in public office. Whether this happy combination is possible in a city like San Francisco will be made the subject of further inquiry.

The Populist Platform.

THE Populists have premulgated their platform and a pretty collection of plated platitudes it is, to be sure.

They demand the re-opening of the mints to the free and unlimited coinage of silver and gold at the rate of 16 to 1. The which, has an ancient and fishlike smell.

They demand the government ownership of railroads. Probably no man ever knew a Populist whom he would trust to manage a transcontinental line of railway and yet no man ever knew a Populist who did not believe that he could run a railroad as "easy" as sliding down a greased board.

They declare that the one remedy for the trusts is that the ownership and control [of trusts] be assumed and exercised by the people. We have been expecting some such declaration for years. It is the outgrowth of the municipal ownership fever.

They demand the initiative and the referendum in national affairs. A pretty mess would insue with this innovation engrafted on our national politics. Hell would be an orderly and quiet place beside us if this doctrine should prevail.

They demand the stoppage of the war in the Philippines, and the assurance to the Philippines of an independent form of government. They reject the magnificent oriental archipelago acquired under the treaty of Paris, and declare that to hold the Philippines would be contrary to the constitution and the plain precepts of humanity; in the very next breath, if not in the same breath, with charming inconsistency they thunder out: "The declaration of independence, the constitution and the American flag are one and inseperable. The Island of Porto Rico is part of the United States, and by levying special and extraordinary custom duties on the commerce of that island the administration has violated the constitution and abandoned the fundimental principles of American liberty." This is blowing hot and cold with a vengeance. If we are to set up an independent government in the Philippines, then why not in Porto Rico? If the declaration of independence, the constitution, the flag and all the rest of it belong to Porto Rico, why under this canopy should we deny them to the Philippines? The same treaty, the same act, the same bodies, the same war, brought both Porto Rico and the Philippines into the ownership and under the control of this government. Surely the objection offered by a small, a very small fraction of the inhabitants of the Philippines, headed by a blackmailing, designing murderous leader, does not change the reading of the treaty, or the principles of law or right that govern the case. The proceedings of that lively fellow Aguinaldo cannot warrant such a wide variance of policies; or justify two lines of conduct so radically different, for cases so similar throughout. It is merely a vote-catching scheme.

They extend sympathy to the Boers—a plain vote-catching device, for it can bring the Boers no possible benefit.

They denounce the state government of Idaho and the Federal authorities, for employing the military arm of the government to abridge the civil right of the people. The "civil right of the people" in this instance was the right to blow up and burn down costly mills and mining property of American citizens who refused to be run by the miners' union. The "civil right of the people" in this instance, was the right to commit murder, to indulge in riots and to terroize an entire state. It was the right to escape all punishment for their crimes. It was the right to resume control of the state of Idaho, on the part of the miners' union, and drive every poor devil from its borders, who attempted to make a living without first joining the malcontents.

They denounce Japanese immigration, but they are silent as to the thousands of European immigrants who over-run the country, and who are willing to work for a scale of wages as low, if not lower, than that paid to Japanese. They are silent concerning the thousands of mechanics who cross the Atlantic annually during the busy season, to retnrn to their foreign homes when work grows "slack." They are silent concerning every wrong, where the perpetrators of that wrong are represented by resident countrymen who have votes to cast on election day. They demand "the election of United States senators, presidents, vice-presidents and federal judges and all other officials so far as practicable by the direct vote of the people." Think of it. If it is practicable to elect senators and federal judges by the direct vote of the people, what, under their view of the case, would be considered impracticable? Nothing is impracticable to the impracticable man.

It is to be presumed that this wild platform was drawn by Mr. Bryan's friends, with his consent and approval. It is to be presumed, also, that the Democratic Convention will endorse the Populists by embodying in their platform the leading planks here set out. It is all too evident that the coming fight is to be made on practically the same lines as those of the last national campaign. Radicalism is against conservatism, and a bundle of wild "isms" against a plain, straightforward, business-like policy.

Wouldn't It Jar You.

IN the recent Populist convention Mr. Bryan was referred to by the speakers placing him in nomination in terms so highly laudatory that a stranger would be apt to mistake him for some relative of the Deity. They spread adjectives so thick about him as to hide whatever real worth he might possess. Here are a few samples:

Mr. Bryan is a statesman par excellence safe and conservative, . . . true successor of Jefferson in the true republican spirit and love of the common people, . . . the greatest man in life and thought that ever acquired prominence before the American people, . . . a great statesman, a moral man, incapable of a mean act or a mean thought, representing all that is hopeful and glorious and patriotic in the American people, . . . He embodies all that is good, all that is pure, all that is loyal, . . . a statesman of ripe experience, a philosopher, a patriot without a peer in this or any other country. . . . Peerless, bold, determined, . . . an ideal candidate, . . . He is the embodiment of all that opposes plutocracy, greed and the exercise of criminal power in public life, . . . The most American citizen of the age, . . . As an orator and a statesman the equal of Webster and Clay, if not their superior, . . . Magnificent man, hero, statesman and orator.

Gentle reader, in the language of the street, wouldn't this jar you.

THE TURKISH MINISTER'S BLUFF.

WHY McKINLEY CHANGED HIS MIND CONCERNING THE ARMENIAN CLAIMS.

THE shifting of the diplomatic checker-board has made the Turkish Minister, Ali Ferrough Bey, the leading figure in the diplomatic circle at Washington. It is to him more than to any other one man that our State Department looks for a happy solution of the present missionary embroglio. Abdul Hamid and his own cabinet are sunk deep in Mediaeval ideas on diplomacy; there is little hope in that direction. But the present head of the Turkish embassy is probably the keenest and most progressive diplomat who ever came out of Constantinople. His predecessors in Washington were notable failures. He was picked for the work solely because of his adaptability to European ideas. A thorough Mohammedan, he yet appreciates Occidental progress and understands Christian ideas. His first diplomatic appointment was to Paris; there, he followed our customs by enrolling himself in the School of Political Science at the University of Paris. Here, he took a degree previous to his transfer to London. Thence, he went to Bucharest, where he was so successful that he was awarded by an appointment to St. Petersburg, the most important foreign legation of the Turkish government. From there, he was sent to Washington. So valuable has he made himself, that, when he asked to be recalled owing to ill-health some months ago, he was kept at the post by order of the Sulton.

It is this astute Turk who is running on Uncle Sam a most beautiful and successful game of pure bluff. Say no more that we Americans are the bluffers of the world. The Turkish Minister can give us cards and spades and take the chips. For, be it known, it is the missionary element which has pushed us on into making a rumpus over the American claims. This part of the population has always figured in our embroglios with heathen nations. The missionary spirit has been a factor of no small account in the Philippine situation, and it has had much say in Cuban affairs. All this, however, has been done in rather a quiet way; but upon the Armenian subject the missionary people rose up and beat the air. Uncle Sam was urged and cajoled to dispatch a fleet to the Dardanelles at once, and to force immediate payment. And so strong was the pressure that the State Department was seriously influenced thereby.

Now, behold the results of having a Turkish Minister with brains in his head and eyes in his face. He knew, just as well as McKinley, what sort of persuasion was rendering our diplom tic demands urgent and immediate. He received our semi-ultimatum with a diplomatic smile, and telegraphed home for instructions. They came, evidently, and he then presented himself for a conference. He seemed to be begging the question, at first. Instead of plunging in on the crucial matter, he commenced to enquire concerning the status of our missions and missionaries in Turkey.

"You have a great many missions, have you not?" he said.

Secretary Hay informed him that we had. He even went so far as to point them out on the map.

"Exactly," said the Turk, "and I suppose that your friends the missionaries would find it—inconvenient—to have some more destroyed—is it not so?"

"You don't mean to threaten us, do you?" said Mr. Hay.

"Oh, not at all, not at all! But the Turkish mob is an unruly thing, you know. I would deplore any lawlessness, but you might tell your missionaries that, in case an American fleet threatens Constantinople." Saying which, the speakable Turk withdrew and left our Secretary of State to his meditations.

That his bluff worked, is proved by the changed attitude of the State Department, who are propitiating the war spirit by every means in their power. That his threat of mob hostility was more than a bluff, is the opinion of every capable diplomat in Washington For years, only the fear of Europe and its crusading spirit has kept the Sultan from turning his fanatics loose on the Christians of the West, whom they hate just a bit more than they hate the Armenian Christians. But the fear of a revolution is almost as great. The ruler of Turkey must keep the balance between these two terrors. If he lean too much toward Europe, then his fanatics are ready to rise; if he give his savage people too free a hand, then the iron-clads of the West will come down upon him. There is a strongly backed theory in diplomatic circles that the Armenian massacrers had behind them a political motive. For several years the revolutionary feeling had been growing, until Abdul Hamid realized that he had leaned too far toward the powers. It was an emergency which had to be met by desperate means; the Sultan met it by turning loose the mob upon the Armenians. It is not that he incited the massacres; there was no need of that. He simply let go his control for a few weeks, and the crowd did the rest. Under those circumstances, the excuse afforded by an American bombardment of Constantinople would be eagerly accepted.

So far as the internal harmony of his realm is concerned, such a proceeding would give the Sultan the very popularity for which he is so earnestly and continually striving. The spirit of Mohammed and the Caliphs lingers in Turkey; the ruler who would proclaim a holy war would assure the stability of his dynasty to the third and fourth generation. Of course, it is the fear of Europe and European arms which prevents such a move. There are other reasons, and just as grave ones, for hesitation, even though the Armenian claim were ten times as great as it is. It may be questioned whether any naval demonstration before Smyrna, or even the seizure of any Turkish port by the United States, would be sufficient to bring the Sultan to terms. Like most Oriental rulers, he is relatively indifferent to anything that does not immediately affect his own surroundings. Thus the Emperor of China was quite unconcerned when the English and French fleets bombarded a number of his maritime cities and even took possession of Canton. Nor did he yield until the allied troops had taken Peking and destroyed his world-famed summer palace. In the same way it is doubtful whether Abdul Hamed could be brought to his knees until an American fleet had anchored under the walls of Constantinople and trained its guns on his palace of the Yildiz Kiosk, besides threatening to loot his immense hoards of jewels and money. But before reaching Stamboul, the American men-of-war would be compelled to pass through the Strait of the Dardanelles, lined on either side with concealed batteries armed with the latest type of big quick-firing Krupp guns, under the direction and orders of skilled German artillery officers. Even if no stock were taken of the torpedoes and the submarine mines with which the strait is equipped, there is no doubt that any hostile naval force attempting to reach Constantinople from the Mediterranean would sustain serious damage from the enfilading fire of the cleverly designed and splendidly armed system of forts with which the Dardanelles are now defended.

And then, there is Europe to reckon with. It is by no means impossible that an American demonstration of the sort planned would result in the breaking up of Turkey and, incidentally, the opening of the long awaited European war. Sooner or later the break up of Turkey must take place. But at no time could that prove more unfortunate than at the present moment, when England has her hands full with South Africa and Russia is in the throes of economic difficulties of a serious character. France, too, is preoccupied in connection with her international World's Fair, while Emperor William has no wish whatsoever to endanger through a revolution against the Sultan all the commercial, industrial and political advantages which he has obtained in Turkey. So anxious, indeed, are the great Powers of Europe just now to avoid any trouble in Turkey that I have no doubt they would willingly contribute the amount claimed by the United States from the Sultan were the latter to pass around the hat, in order to avert the danger of a European war.

Abdul Hamed is fully alive to all this. He knows that it is to the interest of the great Powers of Europ to keep him on the throne, no matter what he may do, and naturally he takes advantage thereof. Time and again he has defied the foregn Powers, realizing that neither singly nor collectively could they afford to proceed to extremities. Thus he has only paid two or three small installments of the war indemnity which the Congress of Berlin in 1878 directed him to pay to Russia, and all the efforts on the part of the Muscovite Government to collect the balance have proved fruitless. The Sultan was likewise ordered by the Treaty of Berlin, which gave him a guarantee of the great Powers for the integrity of his dominions, to begin a series of wide-reaching and enlightened reforms in Armenia and the Christian provinces of Turkey in Europe. Yet he has not until now made the slightest attempt to put these reforms into execution, although he had solemnly pledged himself to fulfil the engagements exacted from him by the Berlin Congress—engagements of which he is relieved by the Koran, which teaches that promises to unbelievers need not be kept.

These reasons, as doled out to Secretary Hay by the astute and clever Turkish Minister, furnish the true reason why the administration hesitates, and why Abdul Hamed is allowed to sit back on his capital and make promises for the morrow—as he or some other Sultan has done through all the centuries of Turkey's dealing with the Occident.

THE AMERICAN SKY-SCRAPER IN PARIS.

ONE result of the American exhibit at the Paris Exposition may be a revolution in European ideas on commercial architecture. Strong missionary work is going to be done for the "sky-scraper," a type of building hitherto peculiar to America. How great the opposition is likely to be, may be guessed by anyone who has ever watched an Englishman guffaw or a Frenchman shrug his shoulders in the presence of one of those sky-piercing towers. In Europe, the masonry for business houses is low and massive. There is hardly a business block over six or seven stories in height in any capital of Europe. It is an ingrained idea in these capitals that massiveness is necessary to strength. Europeans insist that an "egg-shell" wall is fragile, dishonest and to be despised. How any structure can carry weight without the size and apparent firmness of their own buildings, they fail to see. Any American builder could show in a half an hour that in a "sky-scraper" the weight is carried on the steel frame, and that the walls have practically no burden to support. But it is hard lines reasoning with a prejudice. Elaborate plans, models and drawings of a typical tall building are going across the water, as a tract for the conversion of European architects.

This American skyscraper is being sent across the ocean, says the New York Herald, in the hope that Europeans may be convinced thereby that their ideas about walls are wrong. They are to be told that the wall, as newly constructed in America, is not a weight-bearer at all; that the weight of great buildings is now supported by steel skeletons concealed behind their fronts of terra cotta, just as the bones within a man's body maintain him in an upright attitude; that the enclosing bricks and mortar have have no more stiffening power than the coat on a man's back, and serve no other office than to exclude the wind and rain.

The truth of this assertion will be proved by a great picture, showing how the skyscraper may stand on its steel legs, with some of the upper stories built up, while the wind whistles freely through the lower rooms, unimpeded by a single brick; and the Frenchmen will be told also that they might begin at the bottom of a completed building and knock out every brick, and that when seventy-six of the lower walls had been demolished the four walls of the twentieth story would still be standing intact.

The idea of thus advertising the American method of construction originated with the Western Society of Engineers, which had been requested by Ferdinand Peck, the American Commissioner General, to procure some typical exhibits. It was felt that in New York the skyscraper idea had reached its fullest development, and so Corydon T. Purdy, an engineer of that city, was selected and commissioned by the government as "expert in charge." The position, however, carried neither salary nor commission, and Mr. Purdy was also advised that the government would do nothing more than pay the cost of transportation and maintenance. This is figured at $10,000.

Mr. Purdy accepted the commission with enthusiasm, little thinking that the executive labor in preparing specifications and dealing with contractors would be almost as great as that involved in erecting a real building. At first the financial difficulties seemed insurmountable, but at last a construction company agreed to act as "angel" and to stand good for any deficiency which might exist. It will have to do so to the tune of about $8,000, of which $14,000 will be a loss, and the entire cost of the exhibit will be $30,008.

The building chosen to represent the system is a new one of eighteen stories now being erected on the corner of Broadway and Chambers streets, and was picked by Mr. Purdy from a number considered. Beauty of architecture had great weight in the selection, because Europeans in general are better educated in these matters than Americans, and would be prejudiced at once against an ugly structure. Indeed, one of the chief objections urged against our tall buildings abroad is their lack of beauty. The best architects of the world have contributed to the traditions of the low building, but the sky-scraper is new to art. The plaster of paris model was done in St. Paul, Minn. It stands only twelve feet high, while the building which it represents is 228 feet high, and every little detail of the ornamentation is faithfully reproduced in it.

Although this model is perhaps the most beautiful feature of the exhibit, it was really one of the least troublesome. Mr. Purdy's greatest difficulty was over the steel frame, and it took no less than three months to find a machinist who could do the work. To appreciate the magnitude of the undertaking, it is only necessary to say that every beam and joint and upright in that last building had to be reproduced in miniature, and that of them there were no less than twenty thousand separate pieces. Several machinists tried to roll them out of solid metal and failed. At last the work was undertaken by Mr. H. C. Hinchcliff, who used thin sheet brass, laboriously cutting it to the required size and then soldering the sheets together, so as to give the effect of the hollow steel beams used in the actual construction. In each one of these hollow beams four sheets of brass were used, and the whole was nickel plated, so that the discoloration of the original metal might not jar upon the nerves of the Parisian critics.

Beside the plaster model of the building, this nickel plated skeleton will occupy the place of honor in the forefront of the exhibit. It will have imitation boilers, engines and furnace in the basement, and from the last a tall smokestack will rise up through the frame and project above the roof. There will be three elevators, whose twelve feet of height will be expressed in little bronze cages only 5½ inches high, and in which two or three humming-birds could be crowded. In fact, it is interesting to note that if the completed model could be peopled with manikins, each 2½ inches high, they would have just about as much room as full-sized men now enjoy in the real New York sky-scrapers. In addition to the engines the metal skeleton will be fitted with all the steam pipes, water pipes, gas pipes and electric wiring which the real building has, and each of these systems will be expressed in pipes of different colors. One of the little elevators will be run by electricity.

The exhibitors hope, if they are unable to convert the French architects, that the practical, businesslike French public can be convinced that American steel construction is the most economical and useful, if not the most artistic, method of building.

Secretary Hay's collection of first editions of modern authors has been enriched by a copy of Rudyard Kipling's first book of tales, the gift of a Bombay friend.

The Municipal Council of Paris, at the instigation of the city's physicians, have distributed through the city two thousand porcelain signs reading: "Remember the Dangers of Consumption; do not expectorate on the street."

It is said that President-elect Rhees, of the University of Rochester, owns one of the best private collections of Oriental manuscripts in the world.

Things & People.

The Matter With California.

IT is significant as showing the real power making for progress in California that the one person who is most zealously urging Californians to grasp the opportunities afforded them by the spread of the United States is President Huntington of the Southern Pacific Company. Our newspapers have whooped up the war spirit and babbled over the fruits of victory; these things make good sensational "copy" and look well with pen-drawings, but not one daily journal of San Francisco has used its columns to show how we may profit by the new order of things or to "boom" the section. This was left for Mr. Huntington. His speech at the annual banquet of the Southern Pacific officials was perhaps the strongest arraignment ever made of the people of California and of the metropolis in particular for their lazy, indifferent, "manana" spirit, the survival of Spanish days. Take this extract: "The journals of the East fairly teem with the triumphs of commercial enterprise in all directions, and recite the bold deeds of capital in new and untried fields, and the world abroad stands aghast at American daring; very much as in ancient times the songs of the deeds of valiant knights rang throughout the land; but there are certain newspapers, great in the particular fields they cover, which seem to take no interest in deeds which tend to build up and foster the resources of your State, but, rather, seek to belittle human endeavor and tear down not only the worthy enterprise which may represent the work of a life time of effort, but the edifice of reputation as well." Nothing more need be said on the subject, because this expresses everything that there is to be said. If California fails to grasp her opportunities, she may know wherein lies the chief cause of failure.

The utter, supreme indifference of Californians to the opportunities afforded by the new national life is appalling. From the time when i became certain that the Philippines were to be added to our national domain, the world looked to California and to San Francisco as the section destined to reap the benefit from the new regime. A conservative British scholar dropped a significant remark when he spoke of "London, the present commercial center of the world, as San Francisco is destined to be the future commercial center of the world." Had such possibilities opened for New York, or Chicago, or Mobile or even sleepy New Orleans or conservative Boston, who doubts that the favored city would have eagerly grasped the opportunity and gone to work to do its best in cultivating the possibilities? Who doubts that press and public would have joined in working for the good of the section, in booming it? But San Francisco, careless, indifferent San Francisco, goes the even tenor of her way and takes no notice. The newspapers, which ought to be outvying one another in attracting capital and stimulating those enterprises which are to grow into the great industrial concerns of the future, are tilting at windmills or leading phantom crusades. If one public-spirited citizen, with the exception of Mr. Huntington, has come forward to urge Californians on to their highest interests, I have yet to hear of it. In the name of enterprise, is California going to let her chance of wealth, prosperity and leadership pass by for mere lack of enterprise? And if this is not an opportunity, what should it be called?

Country Life in California.

IF Californians do not know how to boom their section or to extend their business, they are most certainly learning how to enjoy life. I notice with gratification that country-life plays an ever-increasing part in the existence of most Californians of means and leisure. It was Joaquin Miller, I think, who, coming back from England, called the attention of Americans to the beautiful, well-rounded life of the English country gentleman—a life which is a mingling of the best things from both town and country. When he advanced this view, novel to us then, the country-dweller was ridiculed and despised by the American of means and education. The Anglo-mania which swept over polite society a decade ago first taught Americans the uses of the country life, and there has been a steady advance in the right direction in all sections of the country. But nowhere has the movement gone so fast as in California, where every millionaire owns his own country place and where the best of the younger generation of millionaires are learning to love the life of the country gentleman. Understand me; by "country gentleman" I do not mean the man who has a country-seat and goes there to while away the summer; I mean him who owns his own broad acres and herds and growing things, who takes a personal interest in them and their growth, and who brings to his country home the comfort and refinement of a city dwelling. The real, pure breed is rare in this country, but it is more common in California than in any other section and is on the increase. It is a beautiful way to live; perhaps the most conducive to the development and maintenance of the sound mind in a sound body.

A Case of Criminal Greed.

THE halftone reproduction of the steamer Luella leaving for Cape Nome, reproduced on page 6 of this issue, is a commentary without text on the dangers of the Cape Nome rush. The veriest landlubber can see, by the way the vessel sits on the water—sunk to the gunwales—that she is badly overloaded. This, too, with more freight and passengers to be taken on at Seattle. The Luella may reach Nome, doubtless will, but it will be a matter of pure luck if she does, because it would take only a very mild storm to put a tragic ending to her voyage. 'Tis a plain commentary on the greed of man, when one comes to think about it. On a pleasure voyage, one would never intrust himself to such a vessel, nor on a voyage of ordinary business, however great the chance of legitimate profit. But for the alluring chance of gold, of sudden, unearned wealth—something for nothing—thousands of people are taking the chances and paying premiums upon tickets. If many more vessels loaded like the Luella leave the harbor this year, the Amy disaster stands the best possible chance of a repetition. And it may happen to the Luella as well as to any other boat.

The Best Laugher Will Wait.

THE sight in the Senate of the United States of Clark moved to tears for the sake of his good name and senators surrounding him to offer condolence would have been an affecting one, but for the fact of that little plan in the Montana background: the absence of the governor from the state, Clark's opportune resignation, and the appointment by Acting-Governor Spriggs. It was not a pretty fight before, it was merely a disgusting one; but now it has its points of beauty. Tears may be stayed and condolences and congratulations would do well to await the action of the Senate upon Spriggs's appointment. Had the report of the majority of the Senate committee on elections been acted upon, the result doubtless would have been a declaration that Clark never had been legally elected to the Senate. Therefore it seems that his claim to a seat in the Senate must now be considered as the claim of one appointed by the executive of a state, after that state had had an opportunity to elect by legal means a senator. If this be the status of the case, it will fall under the rule and will be governed by the precedents that prevented claimants from Pennsylvania, Oregon, Washington, and from this same state of Montana, from reaching their goal.

What creatures we are of circumstance! But yesterday the name of Spriggs was unhonored and unsung: not one of us marked the difference between it and Smith or Brown. Today an entire country knows of Spriggs of Montana, and only because of the accident of the absence of his superior in office from the state. And how well this name of Spriggs fits, like a glove the hand, such accidental prominence.

Morality, Theology, and the Bible.

PROFESSOR THWING, the eminent but somewhat sensational theologian, has been making investigations among college men and women regarding their knowledge of the Bible. He took twenty passages from Tennyson containing biblical allusions, and submitted them for explanation to about a hundred young men and women from the leading universities. Dr. Thwing stumped them all. Not one person in the lot could answer every question, and most of them stuck fast on about one-half. Hence the worthy D.D. takes occasion to moralize on the decline of the Bible in the homes and the decay of private and public morals which he believes to be the inevitable consequence. He declares, and with justice, that fifty years ago, a class of men and women of equal age and intelligence would have been ashamed could they not answer every question in the list. The position of the theologian is so false that anyone should be able to realize the flaw in his argument at once. Fifty years ago, books, objects of beauty, the things pertaining to general intellectual culture were much rarer, at least in America, than they are to-day. We were at the finish of the Puritan spirit, when the Bible was the only book, and we were in an age when literature of all kinds was rarer and more costly than it is today. But the Bible was everywhere, and for the lack of other books men read the Bible. That it is less read today does not mean that its truths or its teachings are the less influential in human society. There is an immense mass of literature which gives out second-hand the teachings of the scriptures and possibly does it as well, from a moral standpoint, as does the original source. "The Idylls of the King" may be, probably are, a source of better and sweeter living in modern life, because, it happens that the ethics Alfred of Tennyson's Arthurian poems are founded on scriptural principles. But a person held to morality by Tennyson, while he might be as good as one who gets it from the Bible straight, could not explain so well as his straight-laced brother a line which referred to Joshua and the moon. This unorthodox view has to do with morality alone and begs the question on theology, which is quite another thing.

Spoon-Makers and Horn-Spoilers.

THE little band that meets daily on the corner of Market and Third streets, to darken counsel by words without wisdom, finds one subject that never fails to arouse the ire of those who are gathered together in the name of agitation. He is a poor street orator, indeed, who fails of his share of applause when he launches some platitude against Collis P. Huntington, Irving M. Scott, or any local man who, by his energy and good judgment, has bettered his worldly condition. Yet it is a historical fact that almost every man who has acquired wealth on the Pacific Coast began his business life with little or no capital. If such men have achieved wealth, it was because there were in them qualities of energy, good judgment, and persistency. If any agitator in the band have these qualities, he can, if he will, be a millionaire within the next fifteen years; but to become one, he must work harder than he has ever dreamed of working; work so hard that every other agitator in the land will look upon him as an outcast, no longer worthy to be called one of those who are going to create out of words a new world and a new people, where there will be no more labor nor thought of labor, unless, perchance, some stray capitalist be caught there and harnessed to the plough to make a Utopian holiday.

By Way of Announcement.

THE Belgian Hare craze is a fad which is rapidly growing into an industry. A fad occasionally takes such a course. Witness the bicycle, which was a craze with high-priced accessories a few years ago, and settled down to sober materialism, so that a great part of modern life runs quietly and smoothly on ball bearings. Or, to bring the matter down nearer to the subject, take the Jersey cattle in America. Some twenty years ago, we were paying fabulous prices for Jersey stock—prices clear beyond any profit which could be obtained from the cattle themselves. But a few years later, when the animals had become common enough to realize only moderate prices, they had crowded out the common American stock in good dairies, because it paid better to keep them. The Belgian hare industry is on the same lines. The superiority of the meat, the trifling cost at which they may be fed, the lack of risk involved in their rearing, the rapidity and certainty of reproduction, all give assurance that when the "rabbitries" of the Coast have been stocked with the best strains and a few months or years allowed for increase, the hare will crowd out game and poultry on many tables and hare culture will be a profitable business. All this leads up to an announcement. The next number of the Wave—an enlarged one—will be mainly devoted to an illustrated review of the Belgian Hare industry in Northern California. It will be a complete synopsis of the business, with articles on the care and culture of Belgian hares, a review of the new industry in and around San Francisco, and views of the chief "rabbitries."

Acknowledgment is due to Dr. Arnold Genthe for the excellent portrait of Jack London which appeared in the last issue. It is one of that great photogpapher's best portraits, being not only a remarkable likeness, but an admirable character study.

The "potato town" of Greeley, Colo., in order to encourage improvement of private grounds and care of streets and sidewalks, offers prizes this year for the best display of flowers and shrubbery in private yards, and the best-kept street areas and sidewalks. It is a new plan and is attracting some little attention abroad.

Courtship in the Philippines.

COURTING, befo' de wah, was a ceremonious business in the Philippines, and the path that led to the altar was often a hard road for the man to travel. In some provinces, for example in Tayabas, the young man labored even as Jacob served for Rachel before he could claim his bride. At no time during this servitude was it safe for the apprentice for matrimony to neglect any one of the thousand details of the long Indian Love Code.

Since all the world loves a lover, even the course of true love of an "India pura" in the olden days may be worth following. His mind turned seriously to thoughts of love at an early age, in that country where it is always summer. If then there was no one near his parents' thatched hut that he wanted for mate, he started on a pilgrimage abroad. Perhaps he found the not-impossible She threshing rice in a great "Luzon," the sort of wooden block from which the principal island in the group took its name. Wherever he met her, he would probably begin his wooing by running his fingers lightly along the top of his hair. The Filipino is eloquent with his fingers, and this movement would not be without its significance to Rachel. Seeing, she would understand that this light stroking was the preamble to a petition. Throwing down her flail, she would be done with beating rice, for here was a Jacob to work for her—at least until after marriage. Having found the maiden, the young man thereafter directed his attention almost exclusively to her mother. Without introduction, he could enter the house of his probable mother-in-law as if it were his own. Going in, he said good evening to the parents and was carefully inspected by them. Perhaps they indicated to him that they wanted water; if so, he picked up a heavy pitcher or "bombon" of bamboo and went out and filled it at the nearest spring. There and then his services as "pretendiente" or possible fiancé began. Thenceforward he became entitled to accompany the girl to such social functions as people of their class enjoyed —to church, to fiestas, to choir practice—for among the Filipinos as in old New England, this was an established mode of courtship—and to dances. He piled for her the rice; washed such dishes as there were for the mother; and helped the father in the work of sowing, raising, and harvesting the crops.

Many years ago this term of service lasted two and sometimes three years; later it was usually from harvest to harvest, the "pretendiente," as a general rule, living in the same house with the maid or "dalaga." This close relationship seldom resulted in any formal barriers being broken down, and the exceptions were in those cases where the young people really grew to be fond of each other, and knew that the young man's suit was not looked upon with favor by the girl's parents.

From the begining of the period of serving, two accounts were opened; one kept by the father, and the other by the lover. These Cupid's ledgers make queer reading: for instance, such items as the charge on the part of the lover for a pina handkerchief presented to his inamorata, or so much as the value of his intentions in accompanying the maiden to church. Each day the father gave credit for the work done by Jacob. At the end of the harvest, everything was footed up and a balance struck between the lover's attentions, the work done by him and the value of all he had eaten and drunk. Then there was liquidation and the pretender prepared to receive his sentence, a definite "yes" or "no." In all of these arrangements, the girl's feelings were little considered, and generally she obeyed, without murmuring, the wishes of her parents.

Before the final answer, the lover looked up a sort of preliminary best man, "good fellow" he was called, and these two went to the hut of the lady-love, having warned her of their coming. If they found bare walls and no fire, the outcome for the lover looked gloomy; but if the room was well-furnished after Filipino standards and a cheerful fire blazing, he could take heart of grace. Then the members of both families gathered; preparations were made for supper; and the girl was sought. It was part of the ceremony, however, that she should be in hiding at this time in some neighbor's house. Having found her —and she was always found—the "good fellow" interviewed the father, presenting to him a tray laden with flowers and underneath the flowers a little box that had been filled with siver coins. This offering is called in the native tongue the "habilin." After its presenta ion came supper, and then everybody was as gay and as light-hearted as only these children of the sun can be, eating, drinking, and talking of everything but the probable weddding; then singing and dancing; then home, and the forlorn lover waited another week or a fortnight before learning his fate. This was settled at another gathering of the clans at the same place. If, after supper, the girl's father returned the box of money, there was no hope for the man; but if no money was returned, the "pretendiente" became a duly recognized fiance. If, however, rejection was his fate, he could charge any one who succeeded him as a claimant for the same girl with the balance that the account showed to be due for his services.

Matrimony followed soon after acceptance. The sweethearts, parents, and best man went to the convent, where the parish priest examined into all of the circumstance connected with the engagement; and if it met with his approval, the bans were published. On the eve of the marriage, a great fiesta or celebration was given. It lasted all night and until time to go to the church for the marriage ceremony. Then a procession was formed; and the bridegroom marched with much gravity, alone in the middle of the street or road, at the head of the music. Behind the music, and with equal gravity, came the maiden, loaded with every piece of jewelry she could get hold of; her dress as fanciful and as many-colored as a half-savage taste could make it. The others followed without any regard to their positions in the procession. The ceremony was soon over, and all returned to the house of the bride's parents, where feasting and dancing, almost without ceasing, lasted nine days and nights, during which time the bride's girl friends kept the bridegroom away by never leaving her side; but when the nine days were over, the young couple set up housekeeping in their own thatched nest, without the preliminary of a wedding journey.

CLASS-DAY AT BERKELEY.

A NEW dignity was added to the time-worn function of class-day at Berkeley this year. The year 1900 has marked a period in the history of the University of California. More things have happened to the college in this twelvemonth than in any previous decade of its existence. The old, non-progressive ultra-academic spirit has received its death-blow. A young and able president has been installed, with the power in his hands to remodel the institution along approved lines. The new university buildings have been planned and begun. It does not matter whether they are to be constructed upon the plans laid out by Benard or upon a more rational scheme; interest is aroused, the money for a beginning is well in hand, and ground is broken. Next to the princely gifts of the Stanfords, the greatest sum ever given to a college in the West has been added to the endowment. A new college spirit has been awakened among students and instructors. And last, but not least to the students, this has been a year of almost uns interrupted athletic victory. The ill-advised and disastrou. Eastern trip has been the fly in the ointment, but this is but an item. The fact remains that California had much to be thankful for, much to be proud of, in sending out her last class of the century. The class of 1900 entered an institution which had a strong faculty with weak spots, a somewhat antiquated curriculum and wholly antiquated me hods of administration; a college hampered by a mode of governm nt which seemed designed to hold it back to eighteenth-century ideas. No college in America had so poor an equipment of buildings in proportion to its size and importance, and there was no prospect of change in sight. College spirit was at a low ebb, college athetics —always a barometer of a healthy student feeling—were in a spiritless and disorganized state. Their four years course has seen a complete change in conditions and prospects.

It was doubtless a realization of all this which gave the class day of 1900 its dignity. The old "fancy" pageant which had grown into a tradition was dispensed with, which was, perhaps, just as well, for the students have exhausted most of the changes which can be rung on a "josh" celebration, and the affair has languished in the last year or two. Instead, they introduced the ceremony of breaking ground for the new university. As was fitting, Mrs. Phoebe Hearst, who is almost solely responsible for the changes in administration and the project of new buildings, turned the first spadeful of earth. It was a simple ceremony, even simpler than that by which Wheeler was installed president last fall, and it was the more beautiful therefore. A prayer and a few words of introduction and the little, slight woman with the unassuming, quiet way stepped out from a circle of the college women for whom she has done and planned so much, took in her hands the unaccustomed implement of the other sex—and the new era had begun for the University of California.

THE NEW RULE IN CHINA.

THE North China Daily News of recent date contains a description of the deposition of the late Emperor and the situation in the following weeks. It claims to be a translation from the verbal account of an eye witness, an inmate of the Imperial Palace. While this statement may be taken with allowances, the narrative, as given in full, bears the stamp of truth. Following is an excerpt:

"I was one of those who stood around with ink slab and pen for the Emperor to use, while the Empress Dowager herself held out the pen to him. Even then, His Majesty hesitated to take it and sign the ready prepared 'Imperial' decree of abdication held out to him, but an imperious stamp of the right foot and those piercing, menacing eyes of the Empress Dowager frowning upon him seemed to enthral and fascinate the Emperor, who immediately stretched forth a trembling hand, and the next moment, with a groan and a gesture of despair, as it were, the fatal deed was done, and the Empress Dowager triumphantly snatched the 'decree' from her nephew's hand.

"Then a sudden change occurred, which those around her were too accustomed to see to be startled or astonished at. The Empress Dowager's face became instantly suffused with smiles, her eyes became soft and benevolent, and she was all kindness and motherly solicitude for her Imperial nephew! He, poor, fallen Majesty! had sunken down on his chair after signing the fatal paper, and a moment after he had dyed his robe and the carpet with his blood. His Majesty's excitement had been too much for his weak health, and it seemed that he had burst one of his lesser blood vessels.

"Very kindly and gently the Empress Dowager herself attended to the Emperor, and when he seemed to have somewhat recovered himself she supported him on one side, and with a surprising solicitude for his health and comfort arranged the pillows and cushions in His Majesty's sedan chair, which was to carry him back to his prison. She herself escorted the Emperor to his place of retreat. All the way from Peking to his prison I heard the Emperor weeping at his hard fate. He was so utterly broken down and oppressed. Many of us who escorted His Majes y dropped tears of sympathy, and I peeped at the author of all his evils to see how she took it. Her heart seemed to be of stone. There was that the stern look in her eyes, but not the least sign of oftening.

"As a consequence, Kin Lien-shan is praised sky-high as a devoted patriot and supporter of the Emperor by almost every one in Peking, but I may give a warning that the Empress Dowager is determined to have his head even if it should cost her half the empire. There will be nothing left undone in order to encompass her end, and I heard the Empress Dowager say recently to Prince Ching, who as Grand Chamberlain can enter the palace at all hours of the day and night to see the Empress Dowager, that 'others of the Kang Yu Wei and Kin party must also be put out of the way before either she or the new Emperor will be able to rule the empire quietly.' Finally, you may not know that, ever since the fateful, enforced abdication of the Emperior, His Majesty has four times attempted to commit suicide; his last attempt being the refusal of food and drink in order to starve himself to death."

The Polo Game in Golden Gate Park.

As Seen by Leila.

ONE more week nearer, my dear Diary, to the return of my small sister. What a strain it must be to do the same thing week upon week. I fear that were I a regular correspondent I should endeavor to moralize or give my opinion of people and things in too decisive a manner to be pleasant.

I have seen a good many of my girl friends this last week. We have our own small dinners and luncheons, but as they simply consist of half a dozen of us, I fear they would not interest you. Each day, with the greatest regularity, we receive a long letter from Cricket. It must be a great pleasure for her husband to travel with so enthusiastic a young person. She, it seems to me, has a dinner engagement every night, and is on the continual go every day. Mama and I cannot help being alarmed lest she should do too much. Cricket is, you know, the sort of girl that would go until she dropped. That is one of the many things I could not understand in Cricket. To me, nothing is sufficiently worth while. I do not think I am blase either. I may be, however. Perhaps being blase is a condition one would hardly realize oneself—one never can tell. Quite a number of people drove out to the Park to see the Polo game the other afternoon. It was an exciting game, but the afternoon was so unpleasant we did not find much pleasure in watching it. The game of Polo can divert my mind from almost anything. I am, I might say, sufficiently interested in it to spend a week or so at the Burlingame Club. There are a few rooms there in which one can be exceedingly comfortable. I wonder why it is someone has not built a hotel in Burlingame. It is within such an easy distance of San Francisco that I am sure it would prove a splendid investment and a charming resort. People, it seems to me, never think of the really good things to do with their money in California. One of these days some Eastern capitalist will come in and give us points, and we shall complain and growl and wonder why we do not use our brains. It may be that California is not to be the home of the greatest people of the United States. Our climate may yet be our disadvantage. We may court luxury and laziness as the old Spaniards. Papa and I have weighed this problem again and again in our minds. The art and literature of the West is so new. There is such a demand for it, yet we have but very few who can make it interesting. But Diary, you do not like this sort of a letter, and, as I have no news of special interest what can I tell you?

Jane Blair and her brother left for a trip to the Paris Exposition last week. Jane has been in Europe several times before, so she will have a very jolly visit in Paris. This would hardly prove a good time for an ordinary tourist, for the crowd of sightseers must necessarily be large. Papa is thinking of taking a trip to Carlsbad in August or late in July. He thinks the waters there may cure his gout. I think ours here are quite as good, but I suppose it is necessary to have a certain amount of faith in them. I trust next week will find me a little more entertaining to you, Diary.

LEILA.

Miss Clarissa Weaver of San Francisco is to be married on June 3d, at Los Angeles, to Mr. F. S. Boedenfield, a young business man of the Southern city. Miss Weaver is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. P. L. Weaver, the former an old Californian pioneer, one of the makers of San Francisco, the latter a prominent member of the Century Club and well known in philanthropic and charitable circles. The ceremony, which is to be a very quiet one, will take place in St. Paul's Church, Los Angeles, in which city the young couple expect to reside.

The engagement is announced of Miss Christine Rix, youngest daughter of Mr. and Mrs. E. A. Rix, to Edwin H. Winterburn. Mr. Winterburn is a member of the firm of Foote and Winterburn and a son of Joseph Winterburn.

An exhibition of the work done by the students of the School of Design will be held in the school building, corner of Pine and Mason streets, next Saturday night, May 19, when the awards will be given to the most capable scholars. The exhibition will remain open for three days.

In the London version of Cyrano de Bergerac," prepared by Stuart Ogilvie and Louis N. Parker, "The Song of the Gascon Cadets" is thus translated:

Cadets of Gascony are these,
The Captain de Castel-Jaloux:
Rafflers and rogues, but, if you please,
Cadets of Gascony are these!
Their talk is all of pedigrees,
Quarterings, lineage, who's who;
Where crowns are cracked and the wounded wheeze,
They rush with a shout to the rendezvous.

Lean shanks, but eyes as keen as a bee's,
Pierce bristles cover a tooth or two;
They'll split you if you dare but sneeze
At their heron-legs and their eyes like bees'!
In bad old hats they swagger at ease:
Plumes hide the holes wind whistles through;
And Pierce-paunch, Grim-death, Food-for-Fleas;
Such are the names they answer to.

Cadets of Gascony are these!
They never boast, but dare and do:
A woman smiles—they're on their knees!
Cadets of Gascony are these!
A glance will bring them to their knees
From brown or black eyes, gray or blue,
Maid, wife, or widow, prude or shrew,
French, German, Spanish or Chinese,
They swiftly win who hotly woo:
Cadets of Gascony are these!
They never boast, but dare and do—
Then ride away, and crow "Cuckoo!"

A USEFUL COMPLAINT.

"WHENEVER I hear a young man complain of not having the right kind of a chance in life," said the general life insurance agent, "I think of old Soper, and his one talent, and what he made of it. Never heard of old Soper? Well, he's been dead these fiteen years, but he gave pleasant dreams to one whole generation of struggling life insurance solicitors.

"It was shortly after I had gone to work as a solicitor for the Fraternity Life, nearly eighteen years ago, that I met him first. One day an elderly, well-dressed man came into the office and asked if he could get a few facts about the Fraternity's policies. I got him into a retired corner and proceeded to fill him up. He was a very intelligent man, with a clear head for figures, and he made notes from time to time with a heavy gold pocket pencil in a morocco-covered notebook.

"When I had told him all I knew, he thanked me and said: 'You seem to have an excellent policy and I may wish to talk with you further if you will kindly let me have your card.'

"I did so and suggested an early interview, and after a moment's reflection he named what was in those days the top-notch hotel in New York, and said I might look him up in the smoking room that evening between 6 and 7.

"The rest of that day I spent in trying to conceal my satisfaction from my less fortunate fellow-employees. My career in the insurance business had so far netted me one two-thousand dollar policy and I had begun to have misgivings. But here, plainly, was the insurance solicitors' ideal—solid affluence and strict business, the kind of man that doesn't talk anything less than $10,000. It was probably only a question of whether I had the stuff in me to get the Fraternity in ahead.

"I showed up in the hotel smoking room at five minutes past 6, and about half-past he strolled in with an evening paper. I got him into an easy chair and went to work. I thought I talked well and he certainly seemed deeply impressed. Finally when the psychological moment seemed to have arrived I said:

"'Now, Mr. Soper,'—he had given me his card at the office—'I want to write you for $10,000 at once.'

"'Ten thousand dollars,' he repeated. There was that in his tone that told me on the instant that the sum I had named seemed insignificant.

"'Or better still, $25,000,' I said as soon as I caught my breath.

"'What is your insurance limit?' he asked.

"'Fifty thousand,' I gasped.

"He nodded quietly, and seemed lost for a time in meditation. Then suddenly he arose.

"'Your policy has features which attract me,' he said—with a kindly smile. 'Indeed, the Influential's is the only one that seems to compare with it. I am to see the Influential agent tonight, and if I do not conclude with him I shall wish to have a further talk with you. Just now I must ask you to excuse me as it is my dinner time.'

"'Oh Lord!' I said to myself, 'there's just my luck. I could have the thing nailed in five minutes more, and now that other agent, who's probably an old hand, will practically take that $50,000 commission out of my pocket.' I made a lightning calculation of how much money I had with me, $25, by an accident, and summoning all my nerve asked the old chap to dine with me. He consented graciously, and it looked as though I had my opportunity by the hair.

"I won't bother you with the details of that dinner. After we'd finished soup—Blue Points and soup had always seemed to me a simple matter—I retired from the role of host in confusion, and asked him to take charge, which he did. I had started the wine with a modest hock. He ordered a claret, Lafite, of a vintage, he said, he could recommend, which cost more than champagne, and followed it up with a Montrachet at $6 a quart. And at the end he introduced me to his favorite brand of cigars, a fat thing he called a Celestiale, that smoked like a dream of Araby the Blest, and for which I subsequently gave up 50 cents apiece.

"When I wandered home that night my pocketbook was lighter by $24.75, but what did that amount to? He was going to drop me a line when to come round and finish the thing up—and fifty thousand was the amount he was thinking of.

"But somehow, although I saw him half a dozen times during the next weeks, I handn't quite landed him; although every time I left him it seemed as though everything was over except drawing my commission. He lunched with me three times during those two weeks and dined with me again. I had to borrow the money, but it was no time to look at a dollar or two. And then, sure enough, I got him over to Delmonico's to luncheon, one day, and did land him—for $50,000—and got him around for his examination that same afternoon.

Two hours later I saw our medical examiner. He looked sympathetic.

"'Sorry,' he said. 'Bright's disease.'

"'Oh, look here,' I replied, 'are you sure?'

"'Sure as death,' he said. 'Not very far advanced, but the analysis is plain as day. Absolutely worthless risk.'

"I wrote Soper a note the next day. But, though it was the only decent thing to do, it was several weeks before I got up courage to go round and see him. Finally one night I did hunt him up, but I didn't say my little speech. I found him in the main dining-room at dinner. One Perkins, an agent of the Influential, was doing the honors. There were all sorts of things on the table, solid and liquid. Also an assortment of insurance tables. Perkins was talking earnestly, and Mr. Soper seemed deeply impressed. I retired quietly, pondering as I went.

"A couple of weeks later I ran across Perkins. I mentioned seeing him at dinner, and asked him casually if he had come into a fortune. Then Perkins told me a harrowing, hard-luck story; how he had happened on to this solid, elderly party who was evidently a millionaire, how he had worked at him for three weeks, spent $58 45 in lunches and dinners, finally written him for fifty thousand—no less—and had him thrown down on his medical examination.

"I offered Perkins my sympathy, and after that tried to forget the Soper episode, until one day, young Peasley, our newest solicitor, took me aside. Peasley had been acting peculiarly. Ordinarily he was one of those not unattractive youths who share their hopes and fears with such of their acquaintances as can be got to listen. But lately he had affected a portentous demeanor that had puzzled the rest of the office.

"Peasley swore me to secrecy, and wanted to borrow $50. Fifty cents was considered a substantial accommodation in the office in those days. Peasley noticed my distress and made a clean breast of the matter.

"'Old man,' he said, quivering with suppressed excitement, 'if I can raise $50 I've got a chance of making a year's salary before Saturday.'

"It appeared that he'd picked up an elderly gentleman, who was evidently a millionaire, and who had practically decided to have Peasley write him for no less than $50,000. Bnt, of course, such a deal as that required time and tact. For instance, on several occasions Peasley had taken him to luncheon or dinner. Of course, you couldn't ask a millionaire out to any quick lunch, and Peasley had been able to raise about $45 so far.

"When Peasley paused for breath I advised his withdrawing from the transaction where it stood.

"Why, what's the matter with it?" asked Peasley, bristling.

"'First, your elderly friend's got Bright's disease,' I said, 'second, I believe he's a nice, smooth, gormandizing old fake.'

"Peasley got up and regarded me sternly. He thought it was funny that I could identify his man on such a meagre description, and suggested turning over to me the fake's address after he had withdrawn from the case.

"A fortnight later he came around and apologized handsomely. He mentioned our manager and the police, but I discouraged the idea.

"'If this story gets out now,' I told him, 'we'll be gray-headed before we hear the last of it. Let's keep quiet and give Soper a chance.'

"We kept quiet, and Soper improved his chance beautifully. During the next six months he went through our office like an epidemic. He was an artist. We got so we could spot a new victim by his symptoms—arrogance and mystery, and an urgent need of ready money. And after each man had passed through the ordeal we brought him into our secret conclave and waited for the next.

"Then we made outside investigations, and found that nine-tenths of the life insurance offices in New York were being favored the same way, and the rest were coming into line at the rate of two or three a month. The various medical examiners got so they waived with any formal examination when Soper was brought in. Of course they might have given the whole snap away, but I learned afterward that he won their sympathy at an early period. And as for the insurance solicitors themselves, it got to be a point of honor in every office in New York to keep quiet and give newcomers the benefit of the experience.

"Then, suddenly, Soper dropped out of view and it was a year before any one heard of him again. But one day I happened through his old haunt in the smoking room of the top-notch hotel and found him. He was dreadfully changed and sick looking. I shook hands with him, but he didn't know me. So I introduced myself and got a heart-to-heart talk out of him.

"He had been a bookkeeper somewhere down town, on an extremely meagre salary, and up to the time he was 50 his life had been spent between a dingy office and a shabby boarding house. Then one day an energetic young in surance solicitor had got him interested in a small life policy for the benefit of his sister's children out in Wisconsin. The young man had taken him to dinner at a cheap French restaurant—and the young man's company had rejected him on the ground of incipient Bright's disease. But that modest French dinner had been a bright spot in his career, and it set him thinking. And as a result for nearly three years that lonely life was gladdened by the best table luxuries that the best restaurants in New York could provide.

"And it may seem strange, but a few months later, when poor old Soper went before his final Examiner, an enormous wealth of immortelles, the gift of some sixty odd New York life insurance solicitors, lay as a tribute on his coffin." N. Y. Sun.

Paradise.

One sayeth, "Surely this is Paradise
To lie close tented in her tender eyes;"
And one, "For me the nightingale and rose;'
And one, "For me the converse of the wise.'

Yea, all these things are pleasant in man,s

A Spotless Skin

And a clear complexion are desired by every woman and admired by every man.

Eruptions, pimples and similar blemishes are caused by an impure condition of the blood. These skin blemishes are permanently removed by the use of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery which thoroughly purifies the blood and cures the cause of the disease.

"For about one year and a half my face was badly broken out," writes Miss Carrie Adams, of 116 West Main St., Battlecreek, Mich. "I spent a great deal of money with doctors and for different kinds of medicine, but received no benefit. At last I read one of your advertisements in a paper, and obtained a bottle of Doctor Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery. Before I had taken one bottle of this medicine I noticed a change, and after taking three bottles I was entirely cured.

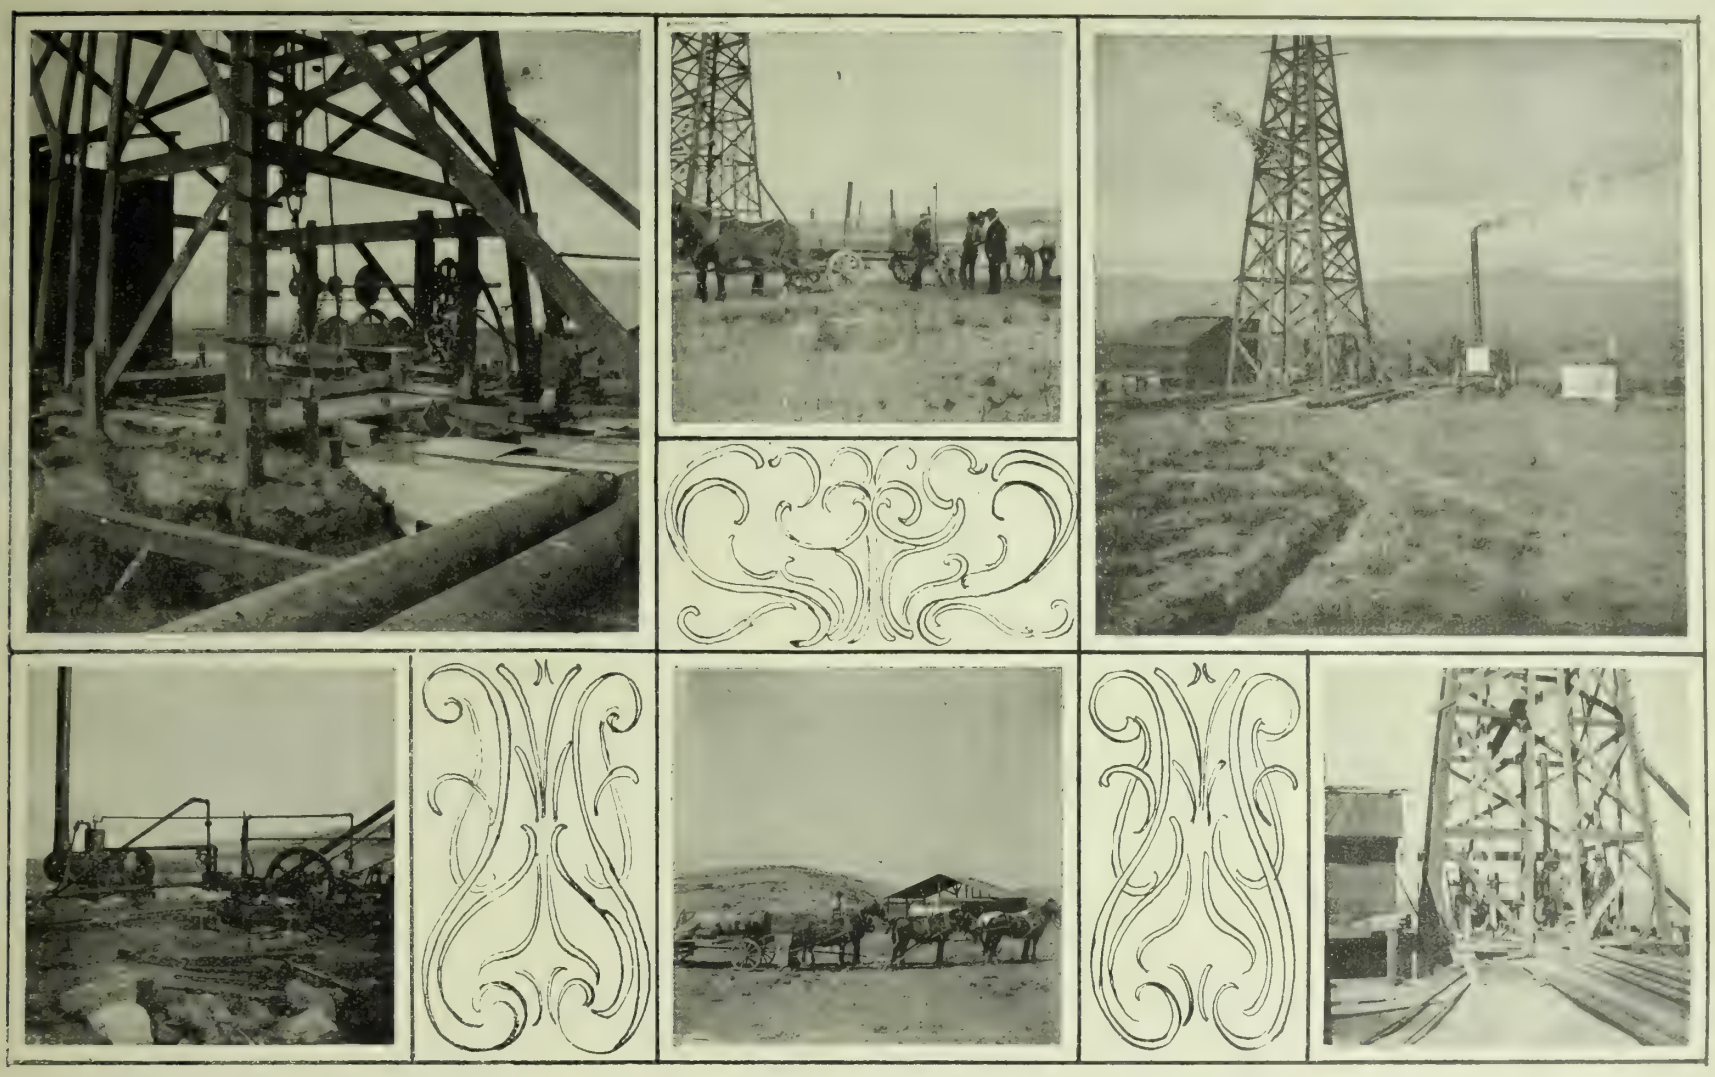
The Florence Oil Development and Exploiting Company.



The above cuts represent the property of The Florence Oil Development and Exploiting Company located on section 15, township 22, south, range 17, e. m. d. b. and m., Kettleman Hills, Kings County, California. The Directors of the Florence congratulate themselves on their future prospects for oil, as since they commenced to handle their property no less than six other companies have commenced operations in their immediate vicinity; demonstrating the fact that others value the Kettleman Hills as oil bearing lands. The Florence stock has always been in good demand from the first day it was put on the market and to day is selling above par. Boring is now being pushed vigorously ahead and its lucky stockholders may reasonably expect early news of an oil strike on the Florence.

SCIENTIFIC NOTES.

The brain of a Belgian hare weighs less for its size, we are told, than the brain of any other known creature—much less than that of a wild rabbit.

The Board of Health at Plainfield, N. J., is considering the question of adopting a rule which will prohibit the burning of leaves within the city limits. Several physicians have said that the smoke and smudge which come from the burning leaves are the cause of many of the ailments of the throat, lungs, and eyes.

The art and mystery of brewing, which is to be a faculty in the University of Birmingham, will not then enter for the first time into the scheme of formal "education" in England. It has been recognized by several country councils as a subject of instruction worthy of being encouraged by annual grants. The Technical Instruction Committee at Manchester is making arrangements for a complete staff of teachers, with a laboratory, in order to encourage the study of brewing.

A new electric incandescent lamp has been invented by Prof. Nernst of Gottingen. This lamp dispenses with the vacuum bulb of the ordinary incandescent lamp, and in place of the fragile carbon filament Prof. Nernst uses a piece of magnesia. The essence of the discovery is that, when magnesium oxide is heated to a very high temperature, a weak electric current suffices to make it intensely luminous. The difficulty in making the lamp commercially useful lies in heating the magnesia cheaply. At present this is effected by placing the magnesia at the focus of a reflector which concentrates the heat derived from a spiral of platinum raised to incandescence by electricity.

Illuminating shells for lighting areas of ocean in life-saving work or to get the range of the vessels of an enemy have been devised by a New York company. The shell used is a hollow cylinder made of steel tubing, and charged with calcium carbide, which, coming into contact with water, generates acetylene gas. The end of the shell remains above water, and at this end are burners lighted by an electric device contained in the shell. It is claimed that the light produced is of one thousand candle-power, and cannot be extinguished by water. The shell is to be shot from a gun to the distance of two miles, and floats with one-quarter of its length above water.

A French scientist has found that a geranium watered with a solution of butylic alcohol became feeble, drowsy, and apparently intoxicated. It emitted a peculiar odor, and showed a blackening and drooping of the foliage.

Taking as a unity the intrinsic brightness of a sheet of Bristol cardboard illuminated by a standard candle at one metre distance, that of a candle flame itself is from twelve thousand to twenty-two thousand; a kerosene lamp flame, ninety-seven thousand; and platinum at its melting-point, one million eight thousand.

IN BOOKDOM

ROBERT GRANT must be something of a pessimist and cynic or he could never have written such a book as his latest, Unleavened Bread. Not only that, but he must be a very satirical misogynist as well. He must be the right prince of woman-haters. For there has been no severer satire written against womankind in recent years, not even Kipling's "Vampire," although the poem, indeed, i on a good deal higher plane as regards the art of it. Young men who contemplate matrimony should let the book alone if they would not have unpleasant doubts raised in their minds concerning the effects of the institution upon the ideals of the individual husband and bread-winner. Young women, however, can afford to read it. Sensible young women will be able to see very clearly why some men do not marry—something, perhaps, worth while for them to see. The other kind will probably deem the story dull, and call quits.

It is a very terrible thing for a sane man to lose faith in woman. Not in her morals nor her ethics; no man is going to lose faith in the morals and ethical standards of his mother and his sisters. No man is going to give up that faith. But in a woman's capacity to sympathize with the very highest aspirations of his innermost soul, and in her willingness to make as great sacrifice for an ideal as he himself is willing to make, men sometimes have not a universal faith. The "not impossible she" sometimes seems almost to have died out when the world was young, so rare is she. But that she lives somewhere men are unwilling to doubt. That fine-souled woman who is to come into a man's life and be a part of himself somewhere exists. Every man normally believes in his heart that she exists. It is a very terrible thing when he loses that belief. It is a very terrible thing to make him lose it.

Therefore Robert Grant must be a very terrible sort of fellow, for he is an iconoclast and a proselyting cynic. He has written a satirical tract against women (against men, too) in the guise of a novel. He has not hesitated to touch with his acid all the poor tinsel of human life he could lay his hands on, turning it black, black, black. And some of it we thought pure gold, more's the pity. It leaves us with a pretty bill on our hands for regilding.

Mr. Grant plans his novel thuswise. He begins by taking for his heroine a very fascinating and beautiful young woman who has passed her life chiefly among books. She is fairly well educated and teaches school for a living. Provincial, of course, but attractive and ambitious. This young woman Mr. Grant marries to a prosperous varnish-maker in town; but Chautauquaism is in the air, the wife comes to consider herself too good for her husband, and after a while there is a divorce. The man goes to the dogs. The woman goes into literature—as editor of a weekly society page for a newspaper. Then a brilliant young New York architect becomes fascinated by the beauty of the heroine and by her seeming sympathy with his own ideals of art, which are of the highest, and forthwith marries her and bears her away to his own home in the city. It takes him several years to find out how shallow a thing is the soul of his wife. When he does at last see how he has been taken in, he finds that he has either to be driven into a commercialism that is the death of all art, or bear the reproaches of the woman because he is not rich. He tries to compromise with himself by doing two men's work, breaks down under the strain, and has the good fortune to die. Which leaves Mrs. Littleton a widow. The woman now runs amuck in the political jungle, and succeeds in spoiling intelligent reform movements, guiding charitable bequests into the one channel in which they never should have entered, and doing other odds and ends of damage. She ends by taking a third husband unto herself, a political charlatan, who becomes Congressman, Governor and United States Senator by more than questionable methods. His new wife is a great aid to him in his casuistical jesuitry. They find that they suit each other to a T. No doubt it is a great thing to be suited to a T in your wife or your husband. A pretty woman can almost always manage it if she keeps trying long enough. The book contains that lesson as one of its morals.

Most of the characters in Unleavened Bread are out and out "unpleasant." They are true to life, yes. But they are true to life, as it were, in the letter rather than in the spirit. And they do not give the whole of the letter. A half truth is sometimes less true than a good round lie. Mr. Grant's bitter arraignment of men and women (especially women) and the institutions of democracy could not well have been made more sweeping nor more severe. It is very bitter satire indeed, or else it is very bitter cynicism. Published by Charles Scribner's Sons, New York.

But if Mr. Grant is a cynic, Mr. W. D. Howells is not. His latest novel, Their Silver Wedding Journey, is admirable for quite the qualities that are lacking in Mr. Grant's book—or because it lacks some of the qualities that are present in Mr. Grant's book either way. Simplicity of style, sympathy with the characters he creates, humor, and that sure craftsmanship of experience in prose writing, these qualities Mr. Howells has made to be associated with his work always. When he takes you out driving you know that the horses are not going to run away with you, and that no one is going to pass you on the road, either. You can snuggle back in the seat and enjoy the ride for what it is worth.

Their Silver Wedding Journey is the account of a trip to Europe, made late in life by an editor and his wife. They attempt to see the same things and feel the same emotions they felt when they were newly married. But there is a difference. They are no longer young, and cannot see the same things and feel the same emotions that they did. What they do feel and see forms the background for a very pretty love story that they are watching, the actors being two young people they have become interested in on board ship. The young man actor, who becomes in a way the hero of the book, is an enthusiastic young writer, now on his first trip to Europe. The young woman heroine is ordinarily beautiful, rich, intelligent and good. A steamer acquaintance ripens into love between these two, naturally; and the love affair is aided and abetted by the old editor and his wife because of the appeal it makes to their imagination. They seem to see in it the story of their own courtship.

The end of the voyage is reached without an understanding, however; the young man becomes involved rather awkwardly with an ignorant employer whom he dislikes; the party breaks up hopelessly; the young man follows the girl, proposes at an inopportune moment, and is refused. The lovers by chance are thrown together in the next town they visit, become engaged, and so on. The story ends with a renewal in America of their engagement, which had been interrupted by a lovers' quarrel.

The book is as different as possible from the rainbow-hued fiction of adventure now prevalent. It is much less gorgeous, and doesn't make use of the patent noise effects. While by no means its author's masterpiece, it is a good piece of workmanship and is interesting. Some books seem to be inspired. This is not one of those books. But it does not pretend to be. Published by Harper & Bros., New York.

I have in my hand two new guide-books to Paris, intended for visitors during the Exposition. One of them is The Woman's Paris, published by Small, Maynard & Co., Boston, and the other is Harper's Guide to Paris, published by Harper & Bros., New York. Both of them are replete with useful information, yet they are entirely different in plan, and do not seem to overlap. The Woman's Paris, for instance, is concerned chiefly with the little details of daily life, such as the prices one ought to pay for service, rooms, food, cabs, and other necessities, and with hints about what a woman ought to see in Paris and how and when to see it. Then, too, the servant question might bother a stranger, and this little book straightens it out:

"In France servants are jovial chums, performing menial offices for hire, it is true, but performing them gayly and (apparently) because they like the family. One's cook does not dismiss one in Paris, but, rather, refuses to be dismissed. There are no afternoons out and no days off. Valentine or Marie may be out every minute when you are, and probably is, but she is on hand when you want her. Her perquisites are secretly levied on the marketing, which is so cheap that it seems impossible there can be a commission. Sometimes she talks very loud; and it does not do to shut her up abruptly, or there might be something louder, by way of conversation. She gives unsolicited advice, comments on the family's affairs—but not outside—the family's visitors and their toilettes; but she means nothing.

"The concierge, who is a sort of servant, exists in every domicile, be it ever so haughty or ever so humble, in Paris. It is usually a woman, except in the large hotels. She demands inevitably to be conciliated, or there may be misunderstandings about calling cards, and visits may go unmentioned. The only way to conciliate the concierge is with cash. The tenant may try attention to her little ones, sweet smiles, consideration of her steps, and other amiable overtures. There will be no practical amelioration of the general disfavor with which a salaried attendant in Paris regards the person he is salaried to wait upon until that person has signified substantially an intention of paying for service already included in his general mulcting. After the intention has been signified, however, and mutual understanding reigns, the concierge will dart up six flights and clear up clouds arising on the shopping horizon when parcels arrive. She will greet visitors with sweet smiles, and explain every one of the tenants' movements for the next week, whether she knows them or not."

Harper's Guide, on the other hand, is much more indispensable, being a very miniature encyclopedia of knowledge, all of it carefully indexed. Everything anyone needs to know about steamship accommodations, cabs, omnibuses, hotels, custom-house regulations, points of interest, streets, municipal matters, theatres, and the Exposition itself, may be found here in alphabetical order, together with quite a considerable array of the ordinary phrases a barbarian might need in order to make himself understood at a pinch. The book comes in pocket size.

AT THE THEATERS

IT IS all very well for us to say from week to week that at one theatre or another a theatrical performance worth seeing is given, and speak of these modest shows in the language we would use were Booth, Barrett and Modjeska once more combined and upon earth, but the fact is that San Francisco has forgotten what a first class performance is like. We have the worst name of any city of the size on the continent. We are ignored, side-tracked—and justly so. We run to vaudeville and the world knows it. Things that go elsewhere halt and stumble here, and we say aloud that it is because they were bad and it took our keen eyes to find it out. And we get personal and say nasty things about the matinee girl's hero and publish the list of the leading lady's husbands and sniff a bit at the kind of clothes the people wear, and advise the manager to take a cheaper house next time he comes round, and lift our artistic eye-brows and wonder how New York and Chicago really stands such insufferably stupid shows; and of course the manager feels pleased; and the leading man and the leading lady and the ingenue are all anxious to come back to a city in which they are treated so politely. And when you meet the manager one day in New York and ask him why he comes no longer to the far Wes,t you learn some things about San Francisco hospitality that you ladies heard so plainly put, and that suffice to explain conditions.

For you know these theatrical people are sensitive, or perhaps you sneeringly call it touchy. They are not on the boards for money alone, they want applause—the hearty hand as the curtain falls, and a word or something beside adverse criticisms in next day's papers. They like to go where they know they please. Oh yes, even the manager, that awful creature who belongs to the syndicate and is supposed to be ruining our good taste and pure morals because we like what he gives us, even this manager prefers a kind word to a cold one and if he were always sure of being accepted as a human being and not a monster he would oftener return and give us the chance to see his pretty play-people.

We're not quite so smart as we think we are; that's the blunt fact. We do know something about plays and how they should be staged and read. But because we have aired our knowledge upon all occasions and takes delight in making people feel unhappy we are left alone in our egotistic glory. The manager has found other fields, quite as lucrative and kindlier, and San Francisco, which was once the best theatre town in the United States is living along today upon a Nid and a Nod and a hank of hair or whatever else you please. London houses are full at twenty shillings a seat. New York turns people away at $2.50 a chair, and San Francisco is struggling to keep two one-dollar houses alive and smoking itself sick elsewhere at fifty cents per. This is not a situation to be proud of. We have the people who want most to see good things. They have the money to pay. Why don't the good people come our way? Twenty plays are running in New York that San Francisco has never seen. Are we too moral for the most of them? That is not the reputation we bear. Are we too far away? That's what they say, but that's not the only reason they stay away. Are our bright boy critics too much for them? There may be something to that. At any rate, our lot is a sad one. But we are learning to do better, learning to behave

Now John Drew is coming, let us be good to him, not because he has come a long way to see us but because he is the sort of stage man we want to see oftener, that we really enjoy, whose friendship is worth cultivating. And perhaps he will tell his friends at the Lombs' Club in New York and they too may wish to see the Golden Gate again.

The stock companies at the California and Alcazar are cruelly compared each time they give a new performance with imported companies who first introduced the plays to our notice. "Neill doesn't do this so well as Goodwin; Hastings doesn't do that so well as Barrymore"—this is not criticism, it is comparison. If we had seen Neill first we might be reversing things, and so with Hastings. In order to get the best the theatrical market affords it is not necessary to make the people who do visit us feel that they are not appreciated. We have carped and criticized the travelling companies into boycotting us and now we want to carp and critize the stock companies into going to Nome or Honolulu and leaving us alone with comic opera and the ever" prosperous Orpheum.

Come shake hands with yourself, dear critic of the daily press, and Mr. Clubman and Miss Passe, and determine for a while that you will smile and not make the whole world grieve because you once saw something better than you can see now. The Orpheum, you must admit, never gave a better show. Koster and Bials seldom sees one as good. Neill gets along bravely upon merit with but one good-looking girl in his company, doing things that Sothern and Goodwin and Mansfield have made famous, and doing them very well indeed. There is nothing great to be seen, no one with a European name, but for auch as we have let us be duly grateful and sweetly sing to them that they may not flee and leave us with no place of amusement but the French restaurant and the City Hall.

As all the dailies have declared in advance, it is a good Orpheum bill this week—lively, entertaining and amusing from start to finish. Ezra Kendall, who comes in for the greatest share of attention, is a genuine funny man; the quaint, quiet manner with which he greets his audience captures the house at once. His yarns—new ones, by the way—and his droll ditties make an interesting twenty minutes. Louise Gunning, a Scotch lassie, warbles "Robin Adair," "Comin' Thro' the Rye," and some other heather ballads, in a sweet soprano, but she rather detracts from the beauty of her voice by running into tones beyond its register. The Newsboys' Quintet are old favorites here, especially the colored member of the chorus whose dancing is the comedy feature of the turn. Dolly and Milton Nobles, Mark Sullivan, Charles Ulrick, Cornetist Bates and other well-known names are on the program. The Nobles have a really meritorious sketch.

The Orpheum Circuit Company announces another strong bill for next week. Ezra Kendall makes an entire change of bill. The Mignani family in their sketch, "The Musical Barbers," are said to be bright and clever. The Wilson family, colored entertainers, do a pickaninny stunt which is very funny. Bartho is a pretty premiere danseuse.

"An American Citizen" is Madeline Lucette Ryley's best comedy and manages to hold the interest of the spectators to the end. The characters are drawn with an artists understanding of modern society, the only exaggerated part being the maiden aunt, the hackneyed comedy type. The rendering is very fair, the hero manages to concentrate the interest of the audience on himself, even of the feminine portion, in spite of the really French looking "toilettes" of the ladies. Mr. Niell does not seek to arouse enthusiasm by his acting, he just finds the right expression for his emotion in that gentlemanly, quiet way which the stars have taught us to expect in modern society plays. The second and the third acts are especially well mounted, lacking nothing of the elegance found in the Riviera high life. The effective chant behind the scene, the falling snow and the lighted church windows in the background at the beginning of the fourth act, the simple surroundings in contrast to the former luxury, combined with the sincerity of the acting of both Mr. Neill and Miss Chapman, prove the climax to a most interesting performance.

Mr. John Drew, now in his eighth season as a star under the direction of Mr. Charles Frohman, will come to the Columbia Theatre the week beginning next Monday evening. He will be seen in "The Tyranny of Tears," of which more that is commendatory has been written than of any other play of many years past. It will be presented by the original company, including Misses Isabel Irving, Ida Conquest, Georgie Mendum, and Messrs. Arthur Byron, Harry Harwood, and Frank E. Lamb. The production will also be the same as that seen at the Empire Theatre, New York City, during the run of several months. Matinees Wednesday and Saturday.

N. C. Goodwin and Maxine Elliott in "When We Were Twenty-One," will follow Drew at the Columbia on Monday, May 28.

Henry Guy Carleton's comedy, "The Butterflies," is next week's bill at the Alcazar. It will be remembered as one of John Drew's old pieces. Its presentation at the Alcazar two years ago was one of the record runs of that house.

The last week but one of their successful engagement will see the Neill Company in Pinero's best comedy—"The Amazons." After them, the farce-comedy stock company.

NO WATCH IN HIS BOSOM.—A professor at Edinburgh University, noted for his absent-mindedness, was hurrying with a friend to catch a train, when he stopped suddenly, and exclaimed: "There! I've come away and left my watch." "Let's go back and get it," suggested the friend. "No; I don't believe we shall have time," said the professor, and he drew the lost watch out of his pocket, looked carefully at the dial, counted the minutes, and added, "No, there won't be enough time." Then he pressed on toward the station, saying: "Oh, well, I suppose I can get along all right for one day without a watch."

x

HER SPECIALTY.—A housewife in the Western Addition advertised recently for a girl to do general housework. A buxom American lass presented herself. "Are you a good cook?" inquired the lady of the house. "No, indeed, I don't cook," was the reply. "Are you a good washer and ironer?" was the next query. "I wouldn't do washing and roning; it's too hard on the hands," declared the caller. "Can you sweep?" the housewife then wanted to know. "No," was the answer, and it was a positive one, "I'm not strong enough for that." "Well, in the name of goodness, what can you do?" said the lady of the house, exasperated. The placid reply was: "I dusts."

x

PROSPERITY.—During Queen Victoria's recent visit to Ireland, an Englishman lounging in Phœnix Park was approached by a ragged old chap, most gloriously intoxicated. "God save the Queen, sor!" said he. "Certainly," was the reply. "God save Queen Victoria!" reiterated the old fellow. "By all means. Send her victorious, happy and glorious!" "That's right, sor! I wish she came to Dublin every year, every month, every day, sor! Think of what's she's done for the country; think of all the good she does to people. Why, look at me; here am I, as drunk as h—l and never paid a penny for it!"

HE KNEW HER.—A philanthropic lady of Pacific Heights, one of the sort of superior slum-raisers shown up in "Fables in Slang," met on one of her tours a little boy who was swearing roundly over a game of marbles. She seized him at once and gave him a good shaking, adding: "You ought to be ashamed of yourself! I never heard such language since the day I was born!" The boy, into whose desolate home she had just been bringing light, pulled himself loose. "Yes'm," he said, "I spose dere was a good deal o' cussin' de day you was born."

x

AN EASY PASSING.—"Bobsy" Meade, Lord Granville's scretary, while stationed at Malta, was horrified at the inhuman way in which executions were conducted at Malta, and interviewed the executioner on the subject. That worthy began to expound on his methods of putting people out of existence and to illustrate by examples. "Now there was Mr. Peace, a small man," he said, "I gave him a six-foot drop, and I hassure you, sir, 'e passed hoff like a summer heve!"

x

A LONG GRAFT.—Police Judge Murphy of Denton, Arizona, had a confirmed drunk up before him every few weeks. Once, the culprit was missing for a period of three months, but turned up at the end of that time, mellow as ever. The judge frowned. "This is the eighth time you have been up before me," he said. "Strange, Judge," said the prisoner, "S' strange how some (hic!) men hold onto office."

x

HER CHANCE.—One day recently an elderly woman from the wilds of Cadder landed at Mitchell Lane, Glasgow, and gazed earnestly down that cart-besieged place, while she occupied the central position between the tramway lines. "Man, man," she at length cried to a passing carter, "whaur will I get an electric car?" "Well, mistress," was the gruff reply, "gin ye dinna get oot o' that gey quick ye'll get it in the sma' o' yer back."

x

THE TROUBLE WITH THE REPUBLICAN PARTY.—Two negroes in Atlanta were discussing the political situation. "McKinley am sho'ly a right good man," said one. "He sho'ly am," said the other, "but I ain't gwine vote for him!" "Why not?" "Cause dat wife of his done all dis heah trust business—dat wife of his, dat Hanna."

CHAMPION BELGIAN HARE SANITARY HEADQUARTERS.

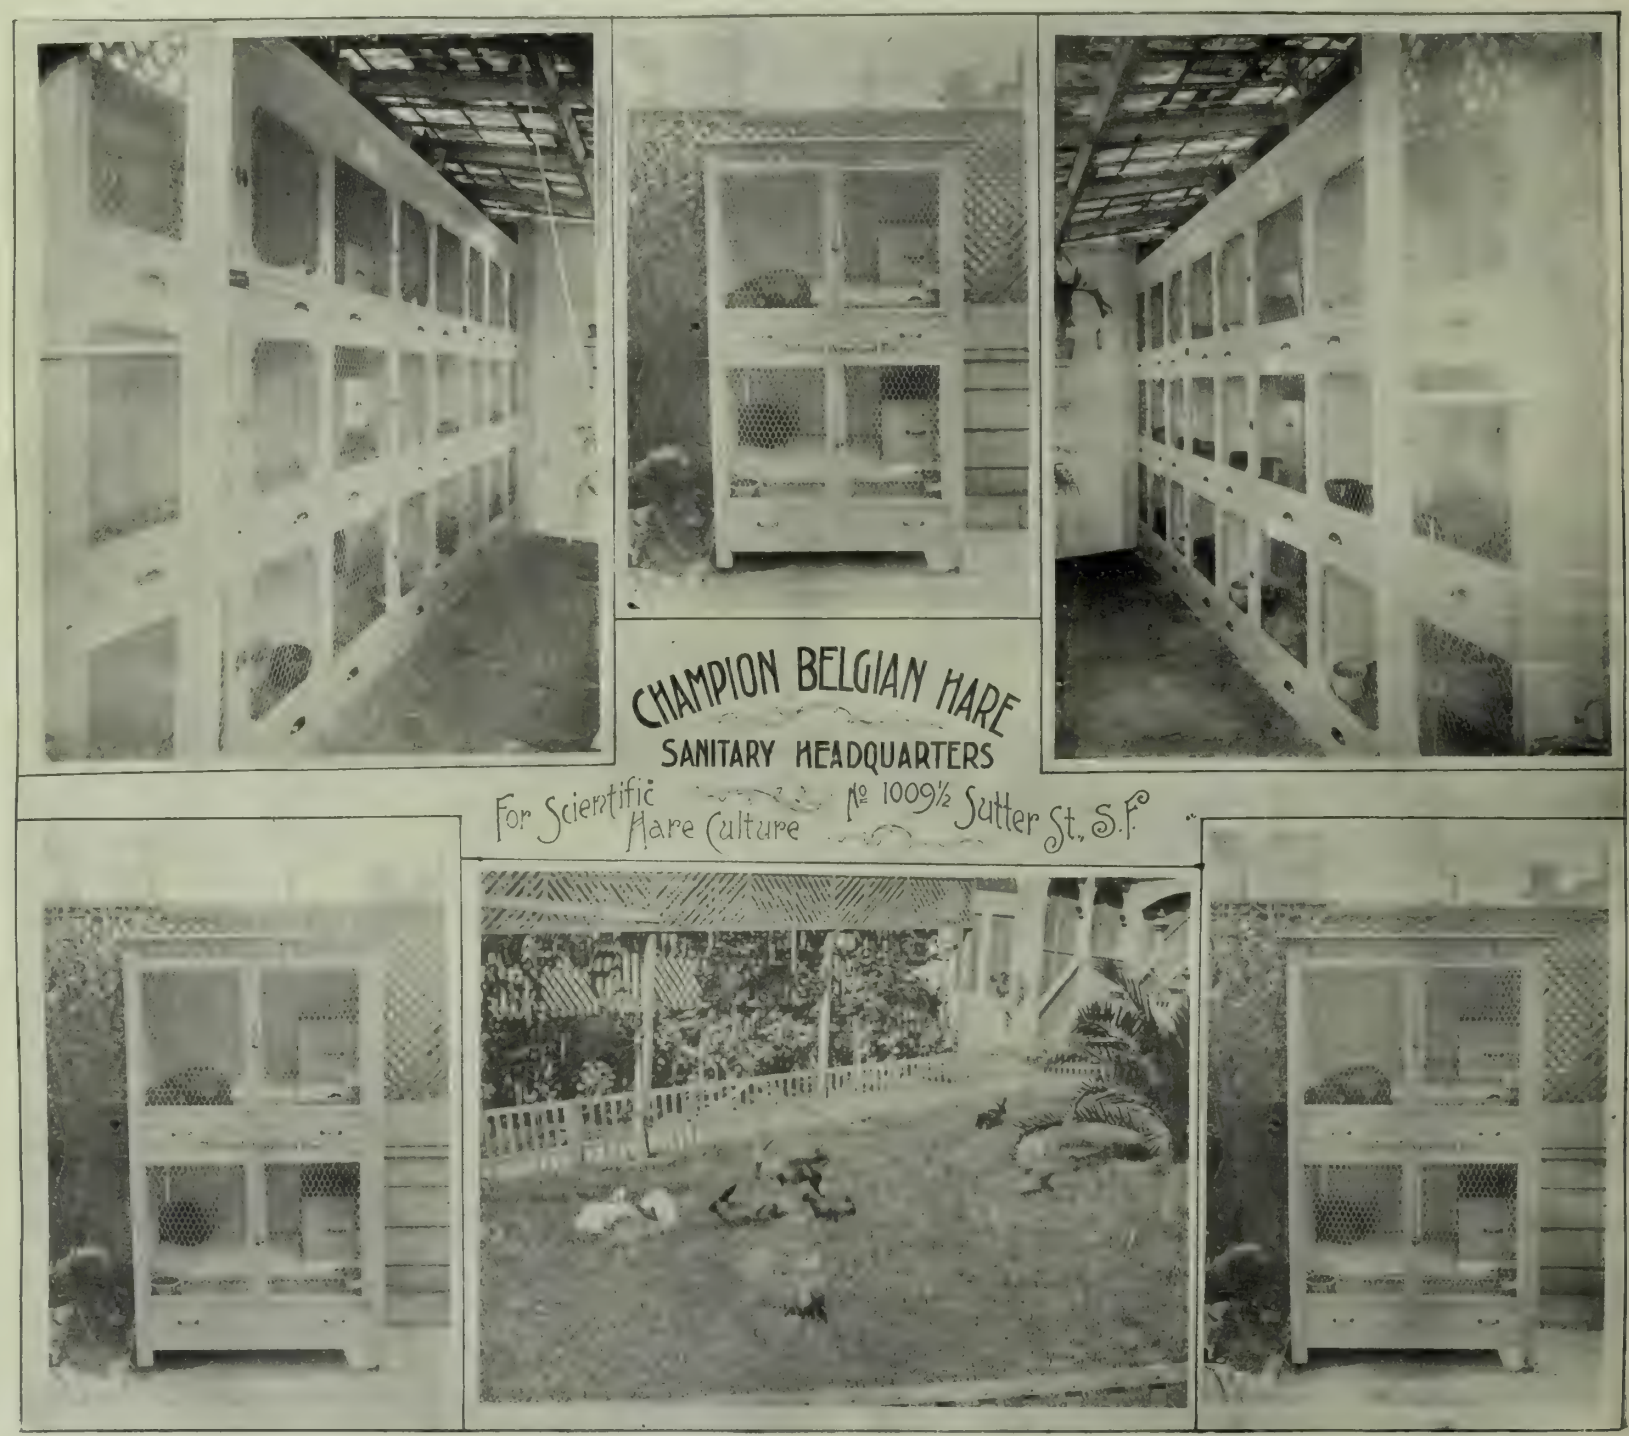
1009½ SUTTER STREET, SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

One of the best sanitary inventions which has lately come into practical u e, is the SANITARY, SELF-CLEANING HARE HUTCH, (see engraving on this page) for which a patent has been applied for by the inventors, Halfpenny and Marsh of Los Angeles, Cal. The future of the Belgian Hare, either as a fancy or as a meat proposition, largely depends on the cleanliness of his little home. Many persons have probably been deterred from Hare raising, because of noting the disgusting and slovenly manner in which the hares are maintained in the old style hutches.

The new, Sanitary Hutch, has many advantages over the old one; it makes the raising of Belgian Hares pleasing as well as profitable, and really meets the wants of the most fastidious, for so far as cleanliness and odor is concerned, a Sanitary Hutch full of Hares would not be a nuisance in even the dwelling of the owner; it is self cleaning, for all the droppings are disposed of automatically, and it is convenient, handsome and entirely sanitary; in it the hares are so kept that disease is practically impossible and the customary drudgery of caring for these little pets, is obviated and their raising becomes a pleasure.

The economical question is completely solved, for one person can easily care for a large number of hutches, and the saving in food becomes quite an item, while the beauty and fine points of the fur remain unimpaired.

The many advantages of these hutches was immediately appreciated by Capitalists, Blooded-Hare breeders and expert Fanciers, who noted their general economy and usefullness and especially the fact that the Hares show to so much better advantage in these large, light and clean apartments, as distinguished from the cramped, dark and filthy boxes found in most so-called 'rabbitries.'



The first cost is not large, and the numerous advantages possessed by the SANITARY HUTCH readily compensate for any additional expense.

Unsanitary conditions in Hare raising are already engaging the attention of the Health Departments, as is shown by the fact that one of the largest and lattest Rabbitries in San Francisco, and containing very fine, imported stock, was condemned as a nuisance by the Health Board Inspectors, ordered abated within 48 hours, and the owner was forced to sell out his whole establishment at a very great loss.

The fact that one large Rabbitry, containing much valuable stock, has already been burned to cinder, caused the Fire Insurance Companies to objec ordinary hutches within the city limits, owing to the bulk of straw, saw-dust and other rubbish constantly accumulating.

Belgian Hare breeding and raising can be done by any person, young or old, and this so-called "fad" may yet be utilized for higher moral purposes and personal culture, in the keeping of young people employed in a legitimate enterprise, instead of as in many instances, following the races, the hounds, frequenting pool-rooms and other degrading sports and amusements; even the ordinary cat or dog-pets, may be superseded by "bunnies," when their care is simplified and made entirely easy by the use of these Sanitary Hutches. Breeders of fine Hares acknoweledge that the meat and the fur of the animals raised in these Hutches is necessary of superior quality, as compared with the old style.

An establishment along the lines mentioned and of a greatly improved type has been inagurated at 1009 1-2 Sutter Street, San Francisco, by Dr. D. A. Hiller, a connoiseur of Belgian Hare stock, and merits the inspection of all lovers of the handsome little animals; this is a model in all respects, and while following the general form of the Halfpenny and Marsh Hutch, the sanitary, economical and altogether pleasing features have been combined to make this, the

CHAMPION BELGIAN HARE SANITARY HEADQUARTERS.

The Agent for these hutches can be found at the same place, and would-be buyers of fine BLOODED BELGIAN HARES, will do well to call here and inspect the beautiful "bunnies" offered before making their purchases, as none but the finest stock is kept for sale.

An ABSOLUTE "Snuffle and Slobbers" Cure is also for sale at 50 cents per bottle; one bottle being enough for a whole rabbitry.

The Boer Peace Delegates. A Fischer, C. H. Wessels and A. D. W. Wolmarans, delegates from the Boer republics to the United States, have arrived, presented their credentials, and scored a popular hit and a diplomatic failure, and are on their way to stump the country for the failing cause of Kruger. The status of these three delegates is a peculiar one. They have no diplomatic standing, since England has possessed ever since Majuba Hill the right to mould the foreign policy of the Transvaal, and America and that nation have, therefore, made no exchange of ministers. They are merely private citizens, so far as our government is concerned, coming to seek an official hearing. The position is like that occupied by Benjamin Franklin when he went to France in order to plead the cause of the unrecognized American colonies. The delegates landed in New York early last week, were met by committees of Boer sympathizers, among them being many Congressmen, and were escorted to Washington. Once there, they requested the privileges of the floor of the Senate. A measure to this effect was rushed before that body, but was defeated, after a hot debate, by a tidy majority. It was noticeable that few of the senators participating dared to defend England; most of those speaking against the measure gave as their cause for opposition the rashness of interfering in the quarrels of a friendly Power. Failing here, the delegates saw President McKinley and Secretary of State Hay and were equally unsuccessful. The President was courteous, but firm in his refusal to mix this country in the muddle. The Boer envoys will now travel through the country, stirring up sympathy. They state that their desire is not for armed intervention, but for peace proposals coming from the United States and having as a basis the securing of the permanent freedom of the two republics.

The South African War. Mafeking is relieved and the forces beleaguring the town have rolled back upon their own frontier, the British are advancing everywhere, Roberts is upon the borders of Transvaal and advancing steadily; the Boers are discouraged. This is the encouraging news which has set London wild during the past week. English prophets, at home and at the front, predict the early close of the war. Its end is, indeed, in sight, and the Burgher cause is hopeless, but whether it will come at once or after another hard campaign, this one rbout Pretoria, is a disputed point. As the end draws near and the history of the war can be seen in perspective, it becomes more and more apparent that the campaign around Kimberly, culmimating in Cronje's capture, was the decisive conflict the turning-point, of the whole war. That movement resulted indirectly in the relief of Ladysmith, opened the way to Bloemfontien and the Free State, and so discouraged the Boers that they have not put up any really tout opposition since. Mafeking was relieved by means of a bold flanking movement, something like the one which French employed in cutting in on Kimberly. The Boers, when they heard that the relief was near, pressed the attack on the city with redoubled fury, but the garrison held out, and when the coloumn finally reached the town, the Besiegers were caught between two fires, one hundred and twenty of them surrendering. The defenders, who had been reduced to rations of horse-meat and bran, were haggard, worn and weak. Roberts is advancing without serious opposition, his horsemen being now upon the Vaal River, his scouts within forty miles of Johannesburg. His greatest success of the week was the surrender of eight hundred Boers squeezed between his own army and the Mafeking relief coloumn. Buller, on the other border, has suffered a slight reverse, a squadron of Colonel Bethume having been ambushed with a loss of over sixty men. This is only a minor affair, but it shows that the Boers are still active. Every line which can be kept on Kruger and his advisers show that they are discouraged and nearly ready to cry quits. In view of the near approach of Robert's forces, a general exodus has begum from Pretoria.

Large Fires Cause a Scare. The recent heavy fire losses throughout the United States and Canada are causing more disturbance in insurance circles than the managers of various companies care to admit. The many commercial journals of the country have espoused the insurance man's cause, and this business, which has always been considered, more or less, one of the necessary evils, is receiving slightly more than its share of attention. Indeed, it seems that there is justice in their demands for higher rates. Their losses during 1899 were over ten million dollars, above all income, and this year, the first four months have shown a loss unprecedented in the history of the business. The various presidents and managers of large companies are declaring that it is hardly fair for companies losing money at the rate of ten millions a year to be considered as trusts, to be legislated against by the differeut states, and decried by the people. If such oppression does not cease, they say, and rates continue to be low, with fire losses as severe as they have been in the past, some big conflagration is liable to sweep a heavily insured city away and bankrupt every company interested, leaving the insurers without a possibility for the recovery of even their premiums. Philadelphia, already, on account of her heavy losses and dangerous districts, is absolutely without safe insurance. The reliable companies have withdrawn and have left the wildcat schemes full sway. The sweeping blaze that carried away the cities of Ottawa and Hull all but annihilated several large corporations; and through the losses of the last few years, the Palatine, a large company, has been absorbed by the Commercial Union. These are not the only changes that are to come, say the managers. No concerns can long stand the prevalent conditions, and there is little doubt that other companies must follow the lead of the Palatine. The alarm has become general and meetings are being held in every state in the union and in England to devise some plan whereby the fire losses may be decreased and higher rates successfully carried.

The Strike in St. Louis Continues. In Kansas City the street car strike is practically at an end, but in St. Louis, the former employes of the St. Louis Transit Company have continued their efforts with such vigor that there is an increase rather than an abatement of the trouble. During the week, President Baumhoff has managed to keep five lines in operation, but the cars have been run only intermittantly and with such danger to traffic that the only success attached to his labors has been the power to keep them moving at all in the face of such determined resistance. Sunday was comparatively quiet, the strike leaders stating that they did not wish to continue the trouble on that day. On Monday, the mobs of the previous week were gathered again and the fight was renewed. The Thirteenth street and the Twenty-Third avenue cars were both stopped. The rioters lined the pavement, firing bullets, and hurling rocks into the passing cars, until all traffic was stopped. Each time, a riot call was turned in and squads of mounted police were hurried to the place to save the working employes and the officers on duty. In the first fight, one boy was killed, and four people seriously wounded. At the Twenty-third street fight, a boy was wounded, a policeman killed and one of the car-conductors beaten almost to death. Three women, who had been passengers on the car causing the trouble, tried to escape, but were overtaken by a mob of women in sympathy with the strikers and all but killed before aid could arrive. There seems to be no thought of either a compromise or surrender. President Baumhoff says that he would like to have the old men return to work, but that he will not discharge the new ones, while President Mahan of the strikers is reported to have declared that there will be no compromise.

No Action on the Canal Bill. The action of the Senate on the Hepburn Nicaragua Bill so strongly fostered by Senator Morgan has about destroyed all hope for the bill's passage during this session. Bills of appropriation have the right of way, now that the session is so nearly ended, and lest there be some hitch with these, Senator Spooner's Philippine resolution is held in constant readiness to act as a "buffer" should Morgan's action become too urgent. During Monday's session there was at least some possibility of bringing the measure forward, but the Alabama senator's poor tact in attempting to rush it when so many of its exponents were absent sent it to the wall once more by the decisive vote of 21 to 28. The Pacific Coast senators voted for it to a man, and worked hard but without success. On Tuesday, Spooner and his resolution again had the floor. During the afternoon, Senator Morgan spoke for his bill. This time it was information he sought concerning the cost of transportation by railroad to the Pacific Coast, the cost of fuel for the trip around the Horn, and the amount of tolls and fares paid by the United States to the Suez canal company. If his questions were a surprise, his resolution, which followed might be called a shock. He called upon the Secretary of the Navy for statistics; the number of vessels sent to the Philippines, the distance of sea to travel, the cost of fuel and the tolls to the canal; and last, the the time and distance covered by the Oregon on her race trip around the Horn, and the coal consumed. Mention of the Oregon was the strongest point he has made. It brought before the Senate that vessel's fast race for time, when time could not be measured by money, and gave the Senators a fancied relapse of the anxiety felt everywhere during that crisis. With those eager for the bill's rejection, there is a sentiment that questions of such a nature should be avoided even if it be necessary to keep Spooner and his Philippines constantly present.

Otis and Peace in Luzon. It could scarcely be doubted, after a review of the week's cablegrams from Manila that General Otis' last report—that the war is over, is true; there have been but six fights of more or less importance since it came. Aginaldo is still at large. He has changed his tactics of late and has now taken to writing proclamations. The latest of these comes from Polillo under date of May 4th, and declares that the recent peace commission is authorized by Congress and invalid. The wily insurgent urges the people of the different provinces to give no credence to the promises or requests of the commissioners, and above all not to lay down their arms. He appeals to them to continue their struggle for liberty, and they have responded with a number of small engagements and not a few casualties to the American troops. Following immediately in the line of Otis' latest report of hostile cessations, comes the news of the fight of Catarma on the Island of Samar, in which th Forty-third Regiment was attacked by a large band of insurgents, and made to fight hard to drive the rebels back. The next day eighty soldiers of the Fortieth Volunteer Infantry were ambushed in the hills near Aquasan, by five hundred natives. The fight lasted some time and had not the Americans been naturally intrenched they could not have held out. But as it was, and is in all of these fights, the Filipinos after their first rush, allowed themselves to be whipped back, and maintained a sullen distance until they were finally driven out entirely. With these and other similar disturbances, the generals on the Islands have become slow to appreciate advices from their major general. General James M. Bell, commanding the hemp provinces of Southern Luzon, has issued orders to his officers not to attempt to organize the municipal government as prescribed by Major General O is. He gives as his reasons the disturbed conditions of the country and the attitude of the natives. The Amer cans are occupying a few Coast towns which the insurgents surround. The garrisons are too small to push operations into the interior and the regiments needed for each Southern province cannot be spared. Added to all these Otis elements of peace, comes the news of the first death of an American from Bubonic plague. Adjutant General Corbin has further added spice to the situation, by asking questions of General Otis concerning a certain peace conference asked for by General Torres. Otis' reply admits such an interview, but states that it was not entirely formal and further was not urged by Aguinaldo himself. The one favorable report comes at the close of the week. It states that ten Filipino companies, consisting of a major, a captain, six lieutenants, one hundred sixty-three men and one hundred sixty-eight rifles surrendered at Tarlac to Colonel Emerson H. Liscum, on May 22nd. In Washington, in the meantime, the Philippino question has the floor with Senator Spooner's bill, to the extent that it is brought up and talked about whenever any other subject is to be avoided With the present outlook, both at the government end and the fighting end of the line, it is hard even to surmise when this cessation of hostilities will come—if it will come at all.

Editorial Comment.

How to Make a Campaign on Public Funds.

IN connection with the question of municipal ownership, we have indicated the consequences that are likely to follow the entrusting of stupendous undertakings to the representatives of a city wherein the government is corrupt. Mr. Weinstock declares that American municipalities are a failure; to be sure, his declaration is not conclusive, but outside of our own convinctions and Mr. Weinstock's declaration there is ample evidence. Alfred R. Conkling, formerly alderman of the City of New York, a member of the state assembly, and one of the founders of the "City Club" of New York, a good government organization, has written a little work on "City Government in the United States" that may be referred to in this connection.

Speaking of the Croton water works of New York, he says:

"A law was passed in 1883 to build a new aqueduct from the Croton River watershed to the city. This stupendous public work became a harvest for politicians; large sums o money have been squandered upon it, and much of the work had to be done over. The defective work was, in part owing to corrupt inspectors and engineers, who approved work that was not only contrary to specifications, but done in a most scandalous manner."

And here it may be as well to consider briefly the question of constructing a new plant for San Francisco. Engineers may estimate and submit figures until the crack o' doom, but nowhere do their estimates show the percentage that must be added to the original cost to satisfy corruption, nowhere do they show the percentage for repairs and reconstructing "skimped" work. In the acquisition of water works for San Francisco the inclination of the politician will be strong toward constructing an entirely new plant There is more "politics" in it. More political capital to be made out of inaugurating a "stupendous public work" and to become as Mr. Conkling says, a "harvest for politicians." There are votes and there is power behind the employment of large bodies of men through the several counties to be traversed by the pipe line. But until the last shovelful of earth has been turned, until the last ditch has been dug, the last length of pipe laid, no human being can foretell where the original cost will end. And after the work has been finished and accepted, flimsy and scandalous work of corrupt contractors will begin to develope, and no man will be able to foretell where repairs and reconstruction will end. The disappointment will grow out of the fact that the original estimates will be found to be placed at a temptingly low figure, so as to deceive the voter and justify his preference for original construction. It will be found, just as it has been found in thousands of cases before, that through "inadvertence" the original estimates were low.

There will be no "politics" to be made in purchasing the Spring Valley Works from unwilling stock and bond holders. Such a transaction would be altogether too tame, it would offer no opportunity to "work" the labor vote, it would lack all of the spectacular effects that would go hand in hand with political ambition and the construction of large public works. If among Spring Valley stockholders there lives a fear that their property may be condemned and purchased willy nilly, they may dismiss that apprehension without further thought, for it is not good "politics," and politics will determine the course to be pursued.

Dealing with the question of municipal ownership of water works, Mr. Conkling sets up his ideal system, and we commend it our reader.

"It seems that the cheapest way to supply the inhabitants in a city or town with a satisfactory water service is by a well-guarded and equitable franchise granted to a private corporation, with prices regulated by ordinance. It is then known in advance exactly what has to be provided for and paid. On the other hand, when the municipality owns the works, the constant appropriations paid out of the tax levy, for various necessary but often times unnecessary purposes, makes the total cost greater, although the rates to private consumers may appear less on the water bills than those that would be paid to a private corporation in a similar city."

The reader must bear in mind that Mr. Conkling is a reformer, a man of high intelligence, and that he lives in a city that has owned its own water works for years. He speaks from experience. Again he says:

"Municipal ownership of water works is constantly growing more popular. When they are thus owned, the average citizen seems to feel a sort of joint proprietorship in our water plant and the local politician uses the patronage which the operation of the works affords, as well as the contracts required for repairs and improvements, to advance his own interests politically and perhaps sometime-financially."

Mr. Conkling's ideal water works, namely the "cheapest way to supply the inhabitants of a city or town with a satisfactory water service" calls for a "well guarded and equitable franchise granted to a private corporation, with price regulated by ordinance." San Francisco already has that. Every purveyor of water in the State is subject to local regulations as to rates. Conditions justifying public ownership existing in some other municipality, cannot be considered applicable to San Francisco, unless it can be shown that all of the surrounding facts and circumstances are identical. In some Eastern cities, corporations owning water works were virtually granted exclusive franchises. Such is not the case here. Anyone may be granted a new franchise and proceed to set up an opposition company. In some Eastern cities, governing local boards have no power to abolish exorbitant and establish fair rates. Such is not the case here. The whole question of rates is vested in a Board of Supervisors elected by the people who consume and pay for water. In some Eastern cities the municipality is at the mercy of the water corporations; in California the water corporations are at the mercy of the cities. It would seem almost foolhardy for a city that already possessed the right to regulate the water rates of private corporations to wilfully embark in the uncertainties of public ownership, when in the end all it would secure to itself would be the naked right to fix the water rates of its own plant. So far as water rates are concerned, the municipality would require no additional power, but it would be cursed with the expensive and unending burden of ownership and this, too, without any certainty that the consumer would receive a dollar of benefit. In communities entirely free from corruption, where the lower class of voters are absent, Mr. Conkling believes it might be safe "to carry out the principle of municipalization of public works so far as is consistent with economy and the wishes of the taxpayers." But he adds, "as I write, municipal officers of all grades in many of the large cities are now under indictment, and many more would be added to the list if it were not for corrupt police magistrates, packed grand juries and negligent district attorneys." He further says: "The tendency of municipal governments in the United States is downward;" and he quotes from Jefferson who said: "The mobs of great cities add just so much to the support of pure government' as sores do to the strength of the human body."

It would scarcely seem necessary in connection with the discussion of municipal ownership to dwell upon the question of corruption, but the voter who is carried away by pure sentimentalism is apt to lose sight of the practical side of the question. Consider for a moment the huge work, the construction of which is now seriously under consideration. A pipe line to some distant and indefinite point in the mountains and a complete water pipe system laid throughout the city only partially tells the tale. Conceive, if you can, the "steals" that would follow and ask yourself the question, "Is San Francisco prepared for this great trust?" Mr. Conkling says: "The public works of American cities are, perhaps, the field of more swindling than any other department of the municipality." And again, "As a general rule, it is impossible to construct a court-house or city hall within the appropriation. Some corrupt contractor commonly finds a deficit in the appropriation and obtains an additional amount to make it up."

It is not the part of wisdom to close one's eyes to a condition of affairs so serious and so manifest. Certain it is, if the public is determined on public ownership, it must scrutinize with suspicion every plan to embark in extensive public works, for here stalks "politics" and corruption. We venture to prophesy—and to this prophecy we will direct our readers' attention months hence—the plan that will be submitted to the voters will call for the construction of an entirely new water system. That will be politics. If the voters approve the bond issue, the original estimate will fall far below the actual cost. That will be intentional. The corrupt contractor and thieving official will make away with large sums of money. That will be boodle. And the author of the mischief will be anathenized from Hell to Hackensack, by indignant citizens and taxpayers. That will be tough.

The New Democracy.

JUDGE ROBERT Y. HAYNE, a thoughtful gentleman, and a Democrat of the refined school, recently suggested that the opposing elements of his party come together and agree upon some "reconciling principle" that would satisfy the demands of the free-silver wing of the party, and at the same time carry with it none of the threat and dread of calamity that goes hand in hand with Bryanism. We have looked in vain for any response to the peaceful overtures made by this gentleman. His standing in the party and his prominence in the state ought to be sufficient to draw from the Democratic press, at least, a discussion of his suggestion. But it did not come.

It is Judge Hayne's suggestion that the gold wing of democracy concede the free coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1, and that the silver wing concede the principle of the liberty of contract i. e., the right of the individual to contract for the kind of money he desires to receive. Judge Hayne says:

"Would it satisfy the silver men?"

It certainly ought to do so. For it would be yielding everything they have asked for, viz: the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of sixteen to one. There would not be the least discrimination between the two metals. Silver would be on precisely the same plane as gold; and everyone could make use of the kind of money which he preferred. Under these circumstances, whatever merits either metal has could not fail to be manifest; and there would be a greater supply.

Existing obligations, the Judge points out, are no longer an issue. He says:

"The recent Act of congress involves a pledge of the national faith, that existing obligations shall be discharged in gold. It is not probable that any considerable number of voters would desire to see such a pledge violated; and the American people would never sanction it."

Wait and see, honest friend. The Populist convention which nominated Mr. Bryan and which is lighting the way for the stumbling feet of democracy, had something to say of this recent Act of congress, and the Democratic party may be trusted to echo the sentiment. It said:

Resolved, That we denounce the Act of March 14, 1900, as the culmination of a long series of conspiracies to deprive the people of their constitutional rights over the money of the nation and relegate to a gigantic money trust the control of the finances, and hence of the people. We denounce this act. . . . We pledge anew the People's party never to cease the agitation until this financial conspiracy is blotted from the statute books, etc.

True this is Populistic doctrine, but if any respectable Democrat expects his party to repudiate this doctrine he is badly deceived.

The silver man would no more dream of accepting the principle of the right of contract to sustain the value of his metal, than he would of abandoning the issue entirely. The silver man is determined upon the doctrine of compulsion. He believes he can cram his silver dollar down your throat by law. He believes the party can be restored, but it is the essence of his belief that compulsion is necessary. Under Mr. Hayne's plan there is no provision that silver shall be received for customs, dues, taxes, etc., etc., hence he neglects one of their favorite plans. The truth is, gentlemen of the Hayne type are out of place in the party now masquerading under the name of Democracy. It has forsaken every principle that attracted thinking men to the old standard. All that remains is the name. Democracy has deserted the men of the Hayne type. They have not changed their views, the party has simply bolted away from decency. It has fallen into hands that are unclean, and is dominated by men with minds warped by prejudice, and unfit to control its doctrines.

Mr. Hayne says he does not believe that any considerable number of men would desire to see a pledge of national faith violated. The Populists, as he will have seen, are anxious to get a "whack" at that "pledge of national faith," and the convention that so declared also nominates that "peerless statesman and patriot" that "most American American," William Jennings Bryan, to carry out its programme of repudiation.

The Republican Delegates at Large.

THE selection of U. S, Grant, Jr., as a delegate at large to the National Republican Convention is in a sense a vindication of that gentleman at the hands of his party. Now that the asperities of the hardest fought political contest of the state have softened, honest men acquainted with the facts will concede that at no place and at no time was Mr. Grant guilty of a dishonorable or wrongful act in his canvas for the Senate. He conducted a clean, upright fight, and if ever he comes up for office again, his opponents will not be likely to underestimate his fighting qualities.

Politically, it was a mistake for Dr. Pardee to indulge his aspirations to serve as delegate at large in the coming national convention. The man who is seeking a gubernational nominational must forgo the small ambitions and turn them to account. There is little enough opportunity for the politically ambitious private citizen to deal out political favors. When the wise man has a sprat and wants a mackeral, he does not eat the sprat and fish with a bare hook. Dr. Pardee's success in this minor matter, purely party affairs, has strengthened him none, but has weakened him some. An equal amount of industry on behalf of men ambitious alone to go to the Philadelphia convention, would have earned him friendships that he will need at the next state convention. The re-election of Knight and Rideout filled the list of delegates over which there was a contest.

The defeat of John D. Spreckels is variously viewed by various men. It is the writer's opinion that he is stronger today defeated, than he would have been if chosen, that is, it is within his reach to secure a position in the party which, if he had been successful, would have been beyond him. But unhappy attacks on the integrity of the party convention that defeated him are not calculated to assist toward achieving that end. A hostile Democratic press could have been trusted to exploit this view of his defeat to his entire satisfaction. It was in bad taste coming from the Call. There is a political door-way yawning wide-open for Mr. Spreckels, and if he enters it with a proper comprehension of the possibilities that lie beyond, and a clear conception of what is needed to win, there may be some startling political developments. It is merely a question of sane management.

An Apparently Just Claim.

THE Senate Committee on claims to which was referred the claim of one Geo. F. Schild recently submitted a report that discloses an interesting tale and a long continued wrong inflicted upon the claimant. It appears that in 1880 Schild took out a patent for an improvement in cassion gates. He had an office at the Mare Island navy yard, where he was employed as a naval architect and draftsman. The dry-dock at the yard was approaching completion; a cassion gate was needed and plans had been prepared for one at an estimated cost of $100,000. A model of Schild's invention attracted the Commandant. One C. C. Wolcott, a civil engineer of the navy, obtained from Schild a copy of the plans of his gate and transmitted it to Washington, recommending its adoption. The government later employed the Union Iron Works to construct a gate after Schild's design under Wolcott's inspection. Schild protested against this as an infringement. Failing to secure satisfaction, he brought suit against the iron works. The verdict was in claimant's favor, but inasmuch as the corporation had merely built the gate under the Departments plans, Schild, while establishing the infringement, received only nominal damages. It was shown that the government had saved $40,000 through the use of the gate. Still pursuing justice, Schild instituted suit against the naval officers who were responsible for the appropriation of his patent. He again proved up his prtent, established an enfringement, and proved up gains and profits to the government amounting to $40,000. This case was appealed to the Supreme Court, where judgment was reversed upon the ground that the defendants, being merely servants of the government, were not individually benefitted and plaintiff could not recover against them.

The committee report that Schild is without remedy save through legislation recognizing the moral obligation of the government. His patent has expired, and the committee recommends that it is the duty of the legislative department to afford, in this case, a remedy which the judicial department finds itself unable to give.

ie Projected Subway.

THE daily papers, in commenting upon the proposed underground subway down Market street and, perhaps, under the bay to Oakland and the other towns of Alameda county, have drawn attention to the overcrowded condition of San Francisco's prin- pal thoroughfare. In no other city of the country does ne street bear so great a proportion of the traffic. In the thers, some two or three thoroughfares do duty as arteries f trade, but at the Golden Gate there is only the one. The ity is practically two boroughs, very roughly soldered to- ether by Market street; the joints do not fit, it is true, but o other meeting-ground is possible. New York, though ossessing some six or eight main arteries, experienced the ame trouble with Broadway, and the new underground ailway is a consequence. One has only to walk downtown o business in order to appreciate the dangerous over-crowd- ng of Market street; in one day last week there were three jams" like the famous old Broadway article at the Mar- et-Geary-Third corner. And the trouble will increase vith the growth of the city. The subway is certainly eeded, and it would as certainly pay; whether anyone vill have the enterprise to try it and whether, having tried t, he will not be hampered and delayed by the "municipal wnership" fiends, is another question. As for the subway nder the bay to Oakland, the future of the projected New York-Brooklyn connection must decide. It has never been roved that such an engineering feat is possible and practicable. In theory it is, but the sanction of practice is vanting. But once constructed, it would mean everything o the city. As everyone now knows, San Francisco ought, y all considerations of climate and convenience, to have een placed originally where Oakland and Alameda now tand. That chance is past, but the subway would overcome n great measure the disadvantage of location.

The Police Commission Again.

THE Dogberrys of the San Francisco Police Commission have perpetrated some more "woozy" orders. As all the world and his wife knows, they enforced the "six-foot" partition ordinance something over a month ago. In accordance with the terms of this measure, the saloon-men, great and small, went to great expense in pulling down partitions, purchasing curtains, and otherwise making provision to accede to the orders, absurd though they were. No sooner had this been done, than the Commission passed another sweeping ordinance closing all side entrances. It goes without saying that the side entrance is the feeder of the private dining-room or "box." The very class of people who, while visiting places where liquor is sold, do not wish to be seen in the public bar-room, are the very ones who also use the side entrance. Close this means of ingress, and the private dining-room becomes just so much waste space. Knowing this, as the Commission must have known it, common sense of justice should have prevented this injury to a business which is held legitimate by the law and is licesced by the city. One café alone has expended several thousand dollars in making the changes neccessitated by the first spasm of legislation; the money is, of course, a dead loss. There is hardly a saloon, café or French restaurant in town which does not suffer more or less from this injustice.

I am not defending the side-entrance, with its train of evils. It has been largely responsible for that flaunting of evil which has given rise to the dear old fiction about San Francisco being "the most immoral city, etc." But, in the name of common sense, why didn't the Police Commissioners go the whole thing at once? There is no excuse, absolutely none, for making two bites of a cherry in this manner. The closing of side entrances was the better remedy of the two, without a doubt. The partition rule was a half-measure, hard to define, hard to enforce. It worked injury to restaurants, hotels, bars and other places which were not used for immoral purposes and in which the private dining-room was a convenience. The fault lies in the awkward and blundering way in which the Dogberrys managed it.

A Clergyman in a Quandary.

THE University of Chicago's Divinity School, noted for its weird decisions on theology, has perpetrated an ebullition of priestly wisdom which ought to go on record. Some of the heresy-hunters found that a young professor had written a book with the awful taint of unorthodoxy pertaining thereunto. He was hauled up before a court of his peers and sentenced to suspension with the alternative of retracting, apologizing and publishing another book repudiating and declaring false the sentiments expressed in the first one. To express it in another way, the unlucky professor must leave the ministry or say that he lied. If he takes the latter alternative, he admits that he is a liar, and therefore unfit to pose in the ministry as an object of virtue. If, on the other hand, his retraction is not sincere, he is a liar in the second instance. Anyway you look at it, the unfortunate heretic is frozen out. And then you talk about the Iniquisition of the Middle Ages!

Improvement as She is Practiced.

A feature of our municipal business which would make screaming Hoyt farce is the trade of municipal improvement as practiced in San Francisco. The officers of some of these local improvement clubs have made considerable noise lately by demanding general reductions in municipal salaries all along the line in order to pay out the surplus in city improvements. It is very noble of them, even self-sacrificing, considering that most of these watchdogs of the people's liberties are laying for the very salaried positions whose stipend they are trying to cut down. Entirely too many of the officers in these clubs are on the political lists for appointments. A case in point occured a few weeks ago, when a committee of three was sent up with a petition for reduction of expenses. That committee never reported, because two of its members did not come back. They were caught and, much against their will, forced to accept places in the Hall. If the improvement clubs really intend to improve anything except the financial condition of their officers, they should put a stop to the job-chasing feature of their activities.

The Belvedere Regatta.

CONSIDERING the matchless bay with its great estuaries lying at our very doors, it is surprising that San Francisco pays no more attention than she does to rowing. The regatta at Belvedere last Sunday attracted comparatively little attention, and the rowing of the individual oarsmen was comparatively poor. Some of the men were strong, fine specimens, as well built for rowing as any man ever seen in an Oxford or Harvard boat, but their work was raw, untrained, stiff, and the team-work of the crews was very ragged. An Eastern expert would have laughed at the evident lack of scientific training shown in some of the boats. As I have said, it is somewhat strange. Perhaps the impossibility of a rowing contest between the two universities, owing to the distance of Stanford from suitable water, has something to do with the case. Amateur athletics of all sorts on the Coast have flourished and languished in proportion to the interest taken at the two colleges. But since it is clearly impossible that the colleges can take a hand, it behooves the rowing clubs to go ahead on their own initiative, learning the business, developing style, swing, team-work and waterman ship.

The Nome Drain.

I Mentioned, some two weeks ago, the great rush to Cape Nome from San Francisco and its probable influence upon the city. Later events have proved that my prophecy was no calamity howl. The business season has opened and, in view of the national "tide of prosperity" which is keeping things so lively everywhere else, San Francisco is comparatively dull. The reason has escaped general notice. The men who are going to Cape Nome represent the very best we breed. They are mostly young, energetic and capable, and they are all small capitalists, in that it takes a tidy little sum to purchase a passage and an outfit for Cape Nome. This is the very class which keeps things alive, sets business going, forms the motive power of the industrial machinery. We can not afford to lose the army of young men going to Nome, even for a summer. We will have some of them back again soon, it is true. It would need a heap of gold as big as the Palace Hotel to give profit to all the army who are expending their money and energy in the great rush to the Alaskan fields this summer. It will not pay the most of them, and it assuredly will not pay the city. It is a lasting pity that all this mental and physical force is not being used in grasping the opportunities presented by the new aspect of Oriental affairs. There will be San Francisco's chance in future years, provided she grasps the opportunity—and now, right now in this year of grace 1900 is the fateful and opportune time.

Meantime I see that some California capitalists are about to begin mining in Siberia. There is little doubt that there is gold in the northern Pacific part of that country. It has practically the same conformation as the rich lands around Nome, and American miners have always believed that there were chances in that direction. Indeed, no one is certain but that Americans have already made a haul there. Placer mining on a small scale is impossible in any lands controlled by Russia. The government of the Czar believes in gripping tight everything within reach. In this case, it has gripped the Siberian gold franchises, making terms for royalties and inspection beyond ordinary means. The San Francisco company in question has worked four years and —if rumor is to be believed—spent considerable money with Russian officials in order to obtain its permits. But Siberia is poorly patrolled, and a Seattle report has it that several Alaskan miners have sneaked in, washed out gold in newly discovered tracts far away from the Czar's police, and gotten away to America before they were discovered. But mining by poor men, except on the sly, is impossible in Siberia.

The Season at Morosco's.

MY colleague of the dramatic column stated, when Morosco opened the new extravaganza season at the Grand Opera House, his skepticism as to the result of the venture. Time has fulfilled the prophecy. The present company has been given notice that the season is to close June 1—after which T. Daniel Frawley is to take the management, putting on light comedy. He is at present recuiting a company for the purpose in New York, his last winter's aggregation remaining at the Burbank in Los Angeles. Morosco's has never been a startling success since the close of the good old ten-year run of howling melodrama. The fact is that the structure of the place is against its chances with the ordinary run of stock-company features. It is built on a huge scale; grand opera and melodrama and other things great and loud are, therefore suited to its structure, but light opera and light comedy and all things of that sort lose themselves in its space. These things call rather for a cozy little house, where a comedian may establish confidential relations with his hearers. Frawley will have this to fight against in trying his new stock company. It remains to be seen whether he can overcome the handicap. And speaking of Morosco's, I am reminded that bad news has reached San Francisco concerning Thomas Persse, tenor of the company which appeared at that house last winter. His voice has broken down in Los Angeles, owing to strain and overwork, and he has been obliged to give up the profession for the time at least. 'Tis a pity; it was not a great voice, but a sweet, high and sympathetic one, and the owner knew how to make the most of it.

BOSWELL, JR.

ANOTHER TREE CRUSADE.

THE Calaveras big tree grove is saved, thanks to the good offices of the California Club. The preservation of this noble tract has led to an agitation for the public care of another grove, scarcely less noble. The citizens of Santa Cruz, San Mateo and Santa Clara counties are devising ways and means of saving the Big Basin grove, which caps the junction of the three counties.

The Big Basin grove lies on a plateau which forms the end of the Santa Cruz mountains, the Catskills of California. Here, when the white man came, stood a wild grove of singular beauty, crowned with thousands of magnificent specimens of the Sequoia sempervirens which bears about the same relation to the Sequoia gigantea of the Calaveras groves which a setter bears to a mastiff. Then, there were in California many other spots of similar growth and of almost eqnal beauty, but their accissibility was their ruin. The Big Basin grove, on the contrary, was too far from transportation to be of much use to the lumbermen. So the trees remained, and with them the birds and beasts and shrubs which flourished under their shade. Today, the spot is almost as it was when the Indian ruled. Wild beasts, the few singing birds vouchsafed to California still abound, and the aisles of the huge grove hold the silence of the forest primeval. Over all, the redwoods rise to a great height. They cannot quite vie with their sister trees of the Calaveras groves, but they come very near it. A score pass the three-hundred-foot mark, and hundreds go over two hundred and fifty feet. Nevertheless, it is not their size but their beauty that makes them worthy of preservation. The sempervirens is a much more handsome tree than the gigantea. Moreover, it is neighborly and charitable in its ways, permitting other growing things to have a share in the privileges of the forest. This is contrary to the habit of the giant species, which seems averse to other vegetable life in the region, so that the carpet of needles beneath is as bare as a floor. The Big Basin grove has over fifty varieties of tree growth, including redwood, madrone, oak, pine, maple and sycamore. It has also its share of show features and sensational conformations. In one spot, four of the giants stand on the corners of a diamond figure, as perfectly arranged as though they had been laid out and planted by a surveyor. In the confines of the tract are the springs and sources of a score of streams, some of them arising to the dignity of rivers before they empty into the Pacific.

For many years, the possible future of this tract has been a subject of thought to far-seeing Californians. As early as twenty years ago, the project of forming a park there was suggested. It was seen that the settling of the country would soon make it accessible and that the axe of the forest-destroyer would do the rest. It was the purpose of Leland Stanford to purchase the track and keep it as a sort of botanical experiment station in connection with Stanford University. His death prevented this, as it did many of his other plans. And now, the lumber men are stripping the forests along the beautiful Western slope of the Santa Cruz range and are beginning to bite into the Basin. Three or four years more and it will be past saving.

It would be no great strain on the nation or the state to preserve both the Calaveras and Santa Cruz tracts. The time will come, unless our laws are radically changed, when Sequoias, outside of public parks, will be as extinct as the buffalo. The government has saved a park of the greater trees, and it is now to be asked to save the smaller, but more graceful and beautiful, sempervirens.

The "potato town" of Greeley, Colo., in order to encour age improvement of private grounds and care of streets and sidewalks, offers prizes this year for the best display of flowers and shrubbery in private yards, and the best-kept street areas and sidewalks. It is a new plan and is attracting some little attention abroad.

Two Filipino Shrines.

THE pilgrims to Antipolo in the Philippines probably carry this year Krag-Jorgensens and machine guns. Formerly, in times of peace, the population of Manila and its surroundings, the natives from all of the villages of the neighboring provinces, the inhabitants nearby and those from far away were used to set out in the month of May in coaches, on foot or in small river craft decorated with flags and green branches for the sanctuary of Antipolo, the fiesta of whose saint is celebrated in the month when folk long to go on pilgrimages.

Of all the shrines in the colony that of the Virgin of Antipolo, Nuestra Senora de Buen Viaje y de la Paz (Our Lady of Good Voyage and Peace), is the most popular. There is the image of many miracles. It is said to have been brought in a state galleon from Acapulco, Mexico, in 1626. The legend runs that the people of Mexico were loath to part with the holy image; but the Virgin, wishing to succor the inhabitants of the Spanish Indies, smoothed all difficulties. When she arrived in Manila she was taken in procession to the Cathedral, with bells pealing and guns firing to welcome her. Later the Virgin was intrusted to the Jesuits, and while a church was being built especially for her, she often descended from the altar and showed herself among the branches of a tree called by the Tagalos "Antipolo." The tree was made a pedestal for the image, and so she took her name. Many are the vicissitudes through which the saint has passed since then. She has been safely through fire and rebellion and calmed many troubled waters during her voyages between Manila and Acapulco, on which she has been taken for the safety of the state galleons. Her last voyage was made in 1672, since which time she has been resting on the hills at Antipolo, which place was named for her.

This little village is in the district of Morong, near Manila, and during the month that the festival lasted there was a steady stream of people on all of the highways leading to the sanctuary.

In such processions the gaiety was contagious. No one could withstand the noisy fireworks, the music in the streets, songs, balls in the houses, and the crowds in the church. The village, although every house was opened to the pilgrims, could not hold such an inpouring, and the people overflowed into the country, slept under the trees, or in improvised tents or under sheds of bamboo. In fact, the village depended upon the pilgrims for its existence, as much as forty thousand pesos having been spent during one annual fiesta.

The greater part of the devotees usually tried the water of a mineral fountain near the village of Tanay, close by Antipolo, which water is said to have performed many wonderful cures; nor did they forget, either, to pull leaves from the Tree of Blood that grows by the fountain. These leaves, when beaten to a pulp and swallowed by the natives, have, according to all accounts, effected almost as many cures as the image.

Oblando, also near Manila, is another shrine that was much frequented. There is a tradition among the Filipinos and the mestizos that dancing before the image of the patron saint there cures all kinds of maladies—the more dancing, the greater the efficacy. The procession bound thitherward during this saint's fiesta have a character of their own; for each individual makes it a point to be as capriciously dressed as possible. Everywhere on such an occasion heads could be seen decorated with feathers that bobbed up and down to the music made by timbrels or small guitars carried by the pilgrims. The hot rays of a tropical sun only excited the dancers to greater fury. As they swarmed through the streets of Oblando, the dancing would grow faster and more furious, until there would be forty thousand persons jumping and dancing without ceasing; bubbling over like boiling water; praying and singing and imploring the saint to cure their ills, at the same time exposing a withered arm or a leg covered with sores; never leaving off dancing, not even in the emple.

In order to make the ceremony as imposingas possible and unlike any other in the history of the empire, the Emperor of Japan appointed a commission with the Marquis Ito as the head to perfect a programme for the celebration of the Crown Prince's wedding, which took place recently. A wedding in Japan is always a ceremonious function, but in this instance the show was unusually great, and eclipsed all previous celebrations of a similar kind.

The Crown Prince was born a younger son, on August 31, 1879. By the death of his two older brothers he succeeded to the title of Crown Prince, and was proclaimed successor to the Imperial crown in 1889, when he was decorated with the Grand Order of Merit and received a commission as colonel in the Imperial Royal Guards.

The Emperor was married when he was fifteen years old, and the Crown Prince would probably have followed his example if he had not been in delicate health. Like his brothers who died, he has consumption, and his physicians have made alarming reports as to his condition. He is not the son of the Empress of Japan except by adoption. The Emperor has twelve secondary wives, who come from the noblest families in Japan, and are provided so that, according to the Japanese custom, "the Emperor may not be without an heir." The young prince is the son of Mme. Yanagiwara, one of these Court women, the Empress not having had a son herself.

The Princess Sada Kujio, the fifteen-year-old bride, is the Crown Prince's cousin, and comes from one of the oldest families in the empire. Her genealogical tree dates back to A. D. 650, but her young husband's family records are thriteen hundred years older. A writer on the subject said: "If any unpleasantness happens in the family, he can taunt her with not knowing her grandfathers further back than twelve hundred and fifty years." His ancestry, according to Japanese history, begins with Jimmu Tenno, who ruled Japan 660 B. C.

A marriage in the old Japanese style always takes place in the home of the bridegroom's parents, except in instances where the man assumes the name of his wife, when the ceremony is performed at the bride's home. No ring is used, and no promises are made by the pair as to fidelity, obedience, etc. The main feature of the ceremony proper consists of drinking a number of cups of Japanese wine, or saki, together in certain ways. The bride is always served first during the marriage ceremony, but never again. After marriage the husband is always served first. At the beginning of the ceremonies the bride is dressed in white, but this is changed for a dress which she receives from the bridegroon's parents. The young husband also changes his garb when the ceremony has been performed and puts on new garments which are the gift of the bride's parents.

When George Pauling was constructing a railway in the Philippines, he was much annoyed by the number of Saints' days, each of which the workmen insisted upon celebrating by a general holiday, much to the dislocation of his plans. He noted as a peculiar coincidence that the majority of these Saints' days immediately followed the days on which wages were paid.

So one morning, after his men had treated themselves to a couple of Saints' days in succession, and had returned to earn sufficient for the next general holiday, George called them together and informed that, that day and the following these days being Saints' days, there would be the usual holidays. With the prospects of empty pockets and empty stomachs for so long a period, they asked what Saint in the Calendar they had overlooked? "Saint Pauling," said George without a smile. He kept his word, and from that day he was not troubled with many general holidays.

The BELGIAN HARE

A YEAR ago, the name "Belgian Hare" meant nothing to the average Californian; to-day, there is hardly a person in all California who cannot tell you something of that marvellous industry which has spread with such unexampled speed. The southern part of the State has gone wild over it, so that a person who has not some connection with the industry is looked upon as eccentric. Indeed, it has been a boon there to hundreds of families that have found it difficult to make both ends meet in the past. It has spread to the North, invading San Francisco and the bay region, where it bids fair to equal if not surpass the craze in Los Angeles and the South. It is called a "craze" for want of a better name, but the term is misleading. In reality, it is the beginning of a great and substantial industry. So generally has the breeding of Belgian hares spread on the Coast, that even Alaska is in the movement, inquiries and orders coming weekly from Juneau and Sitka.

The San Francisco Belgian Hare Association is hardly a month old, having been formed late in April at the call of Messrs. Corbett and Langley, two well-known breeders, but it has a hundred members and represents many thousand dollars of invested capital. The names of many prominent men in business and the professions are on the lists, and applications for further membership are coming in rapidly. This organization has crystallized Belgian hare interests and given a great impetus to the industry, so that rabbitries are springing up everywhere as though by magic. The demand for blooded stock is so great that dealers and breeders have great difficulty in filling orders, and San Francisco seems in a fair way to wrest the laurels from Los Angeles and to become the recognized center for the business in California.

A thing which advances immeasurably the chances of the metropolis is the fact that San Francisco has started right. The breed has been propagated by some of the best animals in the country; indeed, there has been little, if any, low grade stock sold or ordered. Further, the control and management of the association and of the business in general has been in the hands of men of judgment, integrity and, in a measure, of experience. For complete experience, the quality of the expert, is undoubtedly lacking; the business is in infancy and handlers have much to learn, but such experience as exists in San Francisco is pretty well concentrated in the management of the association. This is proved by the excellence of the constitution and by-laws, which have won universal commendation abroad, being pronounced the best and most practical in America One feature especially praised is the adoption of the comparison system in judging. All shows held under the auspices of this club are adjudged in this manner and not on cards. Under the latter system, the points are marked on cards, and the animal making the highest score in that manner is pronounced winner. This is beautiful in theory, but it will not work in practice—as was proved at a recent show in Los Angeles, where the award was practically a lottery. In the comparative system, the animals are divided into lots, and the best specimen of each lot chosen to go against the best in another lot. That this is the best and most just plan is shown by the experience of European breeders. For this practical and useful ruling, the San Francisco club is indebted to Mr. H. Langley, probably the wisest expert in the region, for it was he who led the fight against the card system.

But to the industry itself. The chief beauty about Belgian hare-raising is the fact that it can be engaged in without any special initial outlay of capital. It is true that, just at present, the really high-grade stock is held at high prices, but this is inevitable in the early introdution of any advanced breed of animals. Prices are no higher in proportion to returns than those prevailing when Percheron horses and Jersey cattle were first introduced in this country. It is the advice of old hands that the beginner start in a small way, purchasing a few really good animals and then expanding his business through the natural increase of the breed which is, as everyone knows, remarkably fast. If care is taken to introduce new strains through exchange in order to keep up the strength of the blood, one can be in possession of a paying rabbitry in a remarkably short space of time. It does not follow, of course, that the best animals for practical purposes are those held at the highest prices. Chicanery and cheating enter into this, as into any other business matter. Many persons who have stock for sale have bought brood animals of little worth at fancy prices and sell their progeny at the same scale, while being perfectly sincere in the belief that they are advancing a high-class strain. The beginner must guard against this; and he is wise and fortunate who finds an honest and impartial judge to guide him in his early purchases. Many a novice has skinned his pocket-book to buy an animal supposed to score well up toward the 100 mark, but really of little value for either commercial or exhibition purposes.

The "points" in a good specimen, from the view of the commercial breeder rather than that of a fancier, are about as follows: Color is considered a cardinal point. The champion hare is described as being of a general "golden tan" shade. Any tinge of gray or chocolate is a defect. The distribution of the black and white markings is another important consideration. The white should show only on the under part of the belly, the "pads"—by which is meant the soles of the feet exclusive of the toes—the tail and a small spot under the jaws, too much in the last-named place being a grave defect. It should be just visible when the animal is seen in profile. White on the forelegs, nose or upper part of the body would absolutely disqualify for exhibition purposes. Black markings should be confined to two places, "lacing" on the ears and "ticking" on the back. The "lacing" should form a black rim on the edges, well defined and distinct, heaviest at the points and extending well down on the sides. The tint should be a heavy blue-black and should not mix or blend with the other colors; smudgy black is a serious defect.

The "ticking" should be confined to the back, richest near the rump and decreasing on the sides. A little black is allowed on the head, but not too much. "Ticking" is made up of black hairs protruding beyond the shorter golden coat, giving it a wavy appearance, the more wavy the better. Young Belgians do not develop ticking until three months old. Some, known as "late-blooming" specimens, are even later, but these keep their brilliancy longer and are much sought by breeders of experience, since they are believed to hold quality longer. This uncertainty of development makes the judging of young hares by the color a risky business. Experts avoid animals with "ticking" on the legs, chest, and lower parts of the shoulders or sides.

Symmetry in shape is another important item. In a general way, the animal should be long, graceful and of a racy appearance—as in all other features, an improvement upon the wild hare, the rough model. A short, thick-set specimen is particularly undesirable. The back should be nicely arched, flank and ribs well tucked up, fore-legs long, straight and slender, hind-legs powerful in proportion to the fore-legs, but long from back to toe and not coarse. The fore part and chest should be in proportion to the rest of the body and not cumbersome nor heavy. The ideal head is well poised, the nose slightly convex, narrow between the eyes, the jaws not protruding beyond the eyes when viewed from above. There should be good length from the base of the ears to the tip of the nose. The eye, the greatest beauty of a Belgian hare, ought to be large and liquid, resembling that of a fawn. The ears should be about five inches long, smaller or larger according to the size of the specimen. Standard weight is about eight pounds, and many breeders discourage the production of animals going much over this, believing that, so far as fancy stock for breeding purposes is concerned, quality and quantity seldom go hand in hand. Of course, with "meat stock" it is a different story.

These are the main points about a perfect specimen—at least, such as can be set down. Clear above and beyond these is the indefinable "quality," past all description, but recognized at once by the expert judge.

COMPARED WITH DAIRYING.

"FOR sure money returns," said an experienced dairyman of this state, "I would prefer the raising of Belgian hares to my own business. This is no random guess, for I have figured on the profits coming from both industries. Two cows consume enough feed in a year to support 100 does for that length of time, and in a year 100 does will produce 40 young each. At this rate, enough feed to support two cows for one year will give me a yield of 4,000—the lot having a market value of $2,000. My two cows, fed at an equal expense, will yield me $200 in a year—provided, of course, that my cows are a superior stock. You can reckon the rest for yourself. My profits for hare-raising, all other things being equal, would be ten times as great as that which my dairy business yields me."

"Why don't you abandon the dairy business and breed Belgian hares exclusively?" was asked.

"I do not intend to give up an industry which has yielded me solid profits for years" was the reply; "indeed I do not see why the two industries should interfere. Hares can be raised under the same conditions as cattle. I intend to pursue the two together."

COMPARED WITH POULTRY RAISING.

WHILE Belgian breeding will readily engage the attention of all progressive ranchers of moderate means and small holdings, it is to the poultry raiser that it will appeal most directly. The industry appears, indeed, as a fomidable rival to the raising of fowls for market purposes. The rivalry will become the more keen the longer the rabbit industry is established; for, as soon as the craze for fancy stock has passed away, the demand for Belgian hares as a table delicacy will have become a steady one. There is no doubt but that the meat is superior to that of the traditional barnyard staples, the chicken and the turkey, and there is no reason why the increase of demand should not keep pace with the increased production as the merits of the flesh as an edible become better known.

The hare can be bred in localities where poultry raising is impracticable. Properly cared for, the Belgian is much more cleanly than either the turkey or chicken and can be kept in cities and towns where barn-yard fowls could be suppressed as a public nuisance. As a quiet, cleanly animal, a cheap feeder and an easy seller, the Belgian hare can give the hen or the turkey long odds and win in a walk.

AS TO ORIGIN.

The best authorities agree that Belgian hare rabbits originated in Belgium some time early in the present century. They were there known as "Leporines," but that name is now obsolete. In 1850, or there-abouts, a number were sent to English fanciers, who sent about to produce an animal that woule resemble the English wild hare, with all its graceful outlines, beautiful color and size. They weighed well the different types of rabbit which were considered most likely to produce the desired result. One was selected sor its shape, another for color, the next for size and weight, and so on until finally they succeeded in producing an animal with the multiplying qualities of the rabbit and with the color and graceful outlines of their ideal—the English wild hare.

Many persons believe the present type of Belgian wild hare can be found in a wild state in some parts of Europe. While there is a similarity in some respects, their habits and characteristics are entirely different. The wild hare is not giving to burrowing and only breeds twice a year, the young (never more than two) being born well clothed with fur and their eyes open. The Belgian delights in subterranean exploration, and will, if permitted, breed five or more times a year, bringing forth from six to twelve or more helpless young at a litter, their eyes not open for nine or ten days, and in every way showing their common rabbit tendency.

During the history of the Belgian, some enterprising breeder pretended to have succeeded in mating the hare with a rabbit. This theory, however, is groundless, and has never been substantiated.

About 1882 English fanciers who had become interested in the advancement and further development drew up a standard which was universally adopted, but has undergone subsequent revisions until now it seems that most of the fine points are quite well defined, though the progress of the "fancy" side of the business may result in some slight changes.

"Palace Royal" Property of Victoria Rabbitry.

Interior of Victoria Rabbitry.

"The cleanest and most complete Rabbitry we have seen," is the Verdict of Visitors to the VICTORIA RABBITRY. We have at stud, PALACE ROYAL, Imported, score 95, 6 prizes, positively the handsomest buck in the county. PRINCE ALFRED, Imported, score 93¾, champion dam and sire. BLENHEIM, one of Bonanza Prince's finest sons. KLONDIKE NUGGET, JR., as shapely a buck as can be found, and a number of other bucks. Call on us and inspect our stock, or write us for wholesale prices. All our hares are pedigreed, and guaranteed to be exactly as represented. They are not only from many celebrated strains, but are fine individuals. All we ask is a trial, we know we can please you. We have also a nice lot of meat does. 1277 7th Ave., East Oakland, Cal.

The Brant Rabbitry.

Brant Buck, "Britain Meteor.

BRANT RABBITRY—The Brant Rabbitry, at 76 South Tenth Street, consists of four well constructed buildings which will accommodate several hundred rabbits. They are constructed on the most scientific principles and are all adapted to climatic changes so that the stock can be thoroughly protected, thereby keeping them all in a perfectly healthy condition. The stock comprises 150 head of pedigreed hares, including all the best strains, as Lord Britain, Lord Banbury, Lord Dearborn, Lord Kitchener, Sir Styles, Fashoda 11-11, Dash 11-11, etc. In stock there are three fine bucks, viz., Britain Meteor, by Lord Britain, service fee $15, Prince Albert and Grand Marshall, service of these two $15.

The Brant Rabbitry is one whose success is founded on strictly honest and business principles and on whose word its patrons can rely implicitly. Parties who cannot visit the Rabbitry can order by mail and the order will be promptly and carefully filled.

CARE OF BELGIAN HARES.

SINCE the raising of Belgian hares promises to become an established industry throughout the State, it is well to give some hints concerning the culture and breeding of the small animals. These hints, coming from actual experience in raising fancy and market stock, will be especially valuable to that army of small farmers who wish to undertake the culture of Belgian hares, at first, as an experiment.

While it is given as a general rule that rabbits will eat any feed fit for a cow or sheep, yet bunny's digestive apparatus is somewhat sensitive and his appreciation of careful feeding is made manifest by results. Indiscriminate feeding, at all hours, may do for the coarser stock, but the blooded rabbit should have his regular meals; three "squares" a day with a light lunch at three o'clock to stay him till supper time.

Unlike the human animal, the rabbit takes his best meal in the morning, his breakfast consisting of a meal mush, compressed into a cake about four times as large as a hen's egg. For luncheon he takes carrots and similar vegetables and grass and green leaves for salad. His evening meal is simple, consisting of hay alone. Oats should be fed in the afternoon, a handful to a rabbit.

Following is a receipt for the mush-cake, of which bunny's morning meal should consist: Oats, bran and corn meal in equal parts, with a tablespoonful of flaxseed to every six rabbits. Add boiling water and mix thoroughly with a little rabbit condition powder. The mixture should be firm enough to crumble when passed through the fingers. This feed is especially beneficial for young rabbits to which hard grain is unsuitable as nourishment, causing "slobbers" and other ailments peculiar to growing rabbits.

After meal time, if the rabbit has not eaten all the food set before him, the leavings should be taken away in order that the little animal may not gorge himself between meals. This important measure is often neglected by rabbit fanciers with the result that their hares become pot-bellied and clumsy—fatal defects in fine stock. Many people ruin their stock by trying to be too kind to it. As a precautionary measure against over feeding, sawdust should be substituted for hay as bedding. The latter, besides being inedible, is also more cleanly than hay. Water should be kept before them constantly and should be changed twice a day to avoid impurities. Considerable room should be given to growing stock in order that the long, racy lines may be developed through exercise.

In breeding the sine qua non is vigor; and to preserve this in the stock the greatest care should be taken. Do not breed among near relations if you wish to preserve the finer traits of the sire and dam and to rear a strong, healthy variety. In producing fancy stock a pedigree is of vital importance, as the pure bred Belgian is noted for breeding true and the progeny is easily distinguishable by experts from the marked traits imparted by the parent stock. Any marked dissimilarity is an infallable sign of impure blood in the ancestors.

In breeding, the mated animals should be looked to with regard to vigor of health and beauty. Both should be in good coat and properly matured. Do not mate a buck and a doe who are both deficient in the same quality, as the deficiency will be sure to go down to the young. The doe must have developed a full length of coupling before breeding and should be six months old, or over.

On the day of breeding, it is good policy to breed a doe of inferior stock to act as a nurse doe to the breeding doe, who is almost sure to give birth to more young than she can nurse. Six young are as many as a breeding doe should nurse. The young of the nurse should be destroyed at birth, the remainder of the superior stock being given to her to nurse. By this plan you may avoid the danger of weakening the constitution of your fancy doe and of raising feeble stock. It is a great mistake to take young stock away from nursing too early. A rabbit should remain with its mother or foster mother for two months at least, as early weaning often causes permanent injury.

AT a conservative estimate, there are 150,000 rabbits, old and young, in and about Los Angeles. The care of this number gives constant employment to 1,000 persons and requires a part of the time of many more. An army of mechanics is employed in the construction of rabbitries, hutches, fixtures and appurtenances and a colony of dealers in rabbitry supplies thrives on the commerce of the industry. There has never been any craze in stock which has effected a larger area than the present one, nor has any branch of stock-raising brought quicker or more satisfactory returns.

Examples are numerous.

A Los Angeles confectioner, who had met with serious financial reverses, undertook the breeding of Belgians, in a very small way, as a makeshift to tide over a bad time. The culture of a half-dozen rabbits were entrusted to his wife, who cared for her small stock with intelligent interest. Breeding was rapid and sales so good that the husband at last resolved to sell out his candy business and devote herself exclusively to the culture of hares. Profits have been enormous and the confectioner has become one of the leading importers of the state.

Two months ago a gentleman of the same city was selling butter and eggs, a business which yielded him a bare livelihood. He suffered an attack of the "Belgian fever" and at once borrowed a small sum of money with which he invested in two breeding does. Today, without the investment going outside his original output, the investor has realized some $12,000 in stock and cash. He has become one of the importers of fine stock in America.

Buck "Yukon Prize," owned by Eureka Rabbitry.

THE EUREKA RABBITRY, 1616 TURK STREET,

Are importers and breeders of thoroughbred Belgian Hares. Their Rabbitry is headed by that magnificent buck, "Lord Fashoda Chief" (copyrighted), the grandest son of a grandsire. Service fee, $15. He was imported from England in March, 1900, and scored 95½ points. Sired by "Fashoda Chief," winner of 11 firsts and 4 specials. He has magnificent color, superb ticking and lacing, fine length of body, and his hind feet are the kind you read about but seldom see.

A vis't to their rabbitry will pay you, if only to see this grand animal.

They have also "Lady Lutub," imported from England in March. This doe won first prize at Bridlington, Eng., the only time shown. Mason, the leading judge of England, says that she can make any company ashamed of itself. She is from the noted "Prince Leopold" and Lumb's "Noted Doe." A few of her youngsters sired by "Lord Fashoda Chief," are for sale. They are sure prize-winners.

"King Bonanza," "Yukon Prize," and other fine bucks, at stud. "Bonanza," "Britain," "Yukon," "Sir Styles," and does of the other fine strains, at reasonable prices.

Bred does from $10 up.

If you are a beginner, they start you as they started, and you will be successful. If you are a veteran breeder; they can introduce strains of their own breeding that will prove money-makers

You need not take their word for anything. Call and be conviuced. Their success is due to honest dealings, absence of misrepresentation, handling hardy Belgians, and having prices that are right.

You are welcome whether purchasing or not.

They will show you Belgian hares from $2.50 to $500 apiece.

A word to the wise——

It does not cost one cent more to feed and care for thoroughbreds than it does for scrubs.

Myron Springer is General Manager of the rabbitry. Dr. T. R. Jacobs, vice-president of the San Francisco Belgian Hare Association, is one of the proprietors. They guarantee every animal to be absolutely healthy and just as represen ed, or money refunded. Every pedigree that leaves this rabbitry is sworn to before a notary public.

As an evidence of the quality of the stock at the Eureka Rabbitry, the following pedigree pertains to Lord Fashoda Chief and incidentally it may be stated that there are quite a number of his youngsters at this abode of these rare and beautiful pets.

THE CALIFORNIA BELGIAN HARE ASSOCIATION.

Although the Belgian Hare industry through the central part of California is but a few months old, the progress it has made is truly surprising. The California Association in Alameda has been established but a few weeks, but now it has become the largest institution of its kind on the Coast, and one of the leading industries of that city. At its head are the well known capitalists, F. W. Van Sicklen of the Dodge-Sweeney Company, Attorney R. L. Mitchell, W. M. Rank, G. H. Mastick and Mrs. Abby E. Krebbs. The rabbitry is situated on the Neptune Gardens, a pretty little thirty-acre tract near Webster station, and here, a pavilion has been erected large enough to accomodate thousands of Belgian hares. It is here, along with dozens of other bucks of purest strain, that the celebrated Wantage Fox is kept. The stories of animals of pure strain in Southern California is now a thing of the past. The one stud situated just across the bay from San Francisco holds over $15,000 of the best imported stock. In it are two of the three highest scoring bucks in America, each reaching 96

Wantage Fox, that clean-cut and beautiful animal, whose likeness may be seen on the front page of the current issue, leads them all. He is a top notcher, commanding a $50 fee, but he is worth it. In the National Belgian Hare Stud Book of England he is numbered 191. He is by Champion Priory Prince I, out of Wantage Bounce—a pedigree which makes him one of the purest bucks in America. Standing even at $50, the owner of a good doe can accumulate money from his progeny.

In the past week the Californian Belgian Hare Association has had ten of the finest strain rabbits in England imported to its rabbitry, at a cost of $2,750.

Salesroom of the California Belgian Hare Assoc'ation.

When efforts like this are made to give standard to such an institution, there can be little doubt of the intentions of its promoters. In short, the Californian Belgian Hare Association is here to remain. The people who are backing it have done more in three weeks to make it a first-class rabbitry, than others have done in as many years.

Mrs. Abbie E. Krebbs, who is heavily interested in the new association, has said: "Our business is conducted in good faith, and I think the names of the few interested in the company are a sufficient guarantee of this.

"To protect the legitimate dealers," she continues, "all scoring for us is conducted by Mrs. A. M. Bush, the authorized official judge of the Nation l Association." Mrs. Bush, it may be said, has written the score of more thoroughbred rabbits than any other judge in America. She has made the work a life study and her judgment in the many bench shows both in this country and England has never been questioned. The California Association considers itself fortunate in securing her services,

A trip to the the new Rabbitry is well worth the time of any one interested in the Belgian Hare Industry. Neptune Gardens is an ideal park, and the pavilion has been so adapted that it contains both a rabbitry and an exhibit hall.

The inner rooms of the building are arranged for salesrooms and bench shows. The stud and rabbitry proper are separated from a large hall and from each other, while the front of the building has been converted into offices and the other departments pertaining to the business. But descriptions are poor, at best. Only a visit to this place can teach the magnitude and value of the undertaking.

16 to 1," the Champion Cayenne Buck.

Mt. View Belgian Hare Co.

Among the comparatively few firms who have become interested in this attractive little animal, with the intention of maintaining a permanent rabbitry, we number the Mt. View Belgian Hare Co., whose rabbitry at 208 Piedmont avenue, and branch at 268 Twelfth street, Oakland, have been especially fitted up both for an effective display of their stock and for a comfortable and healthy home for this delicate little race. It will be manifest to everyone that it is most desirable to deal with a permanent firm who expect to maintain for years a reputation for square dealing, honest pedigrees and first class stock. A number of dealers from the southern part of the State have recently moved into this vicinity, fitted up a temporary salesroom, sold such stock as they could palm off on innocent beginners and then quietly moved on, seeking new pastures and fresh victims. Those who purchased from them have no recourse should a breeding prove faulty, no one responsible should a pedigree be doubted, no one interested in case of sickness, in fact they are victims of avoidable circumstances. So, we say to those intending to purchase Belgians, visit where you will, but confine your purchases to those firms who expect to remain with you and who have a reputation to maintain. The Mt. View rabbitries contain all grades of stock, headed by the justly celebrated champion Cayenne buck, "16 to 1," (imported); the heavyweight grandson of Arapahoe, Lovillard; a handsome son of British Sovereign; a finely colored son of Dexter (imported); 30 fine does recently received from Los Angeles all scored between 92 and 93½; a number of 90–91 does from Denver; 20 does suitable for "meat stock" trade; does with litters by 16 to 1, Sir Impeto, Lord Banbury, Rainier, Tanforan and Chief Dato. Special attention is given to shipping stock and all mail orders receive as careful attention as if purchase was made in person.

Belgians in Watsonville.

The Britain Rabbitry of Watsonville, California, owned by J. E. Steinhauser & Co., started in business about a year ago, and they showed their good judgment by buying several hundred youngsters before the boom from the leading strains in Los Angeles. This, together with the large number of fine pedigreed does, which they had bred to the different leading bucks, gives them a string of Belgians equal to any in the State. Among their stock are Britains, Fashodas, Trinidads, Styles, Yukons, etc. The Britain Rabbitry is headed by Prince Britain, (the original) who scored by Bush at five months 94 3-4, Gladiator by Sir Styles, and numerous other good ones. They are selling matured does bred to these bucks at reasonable prices. They guarantee good healthy stock acclimated to the central part of the State. Send to them for free booklet and descriptive price list.

The Tremont Rabbitry.

The Tremont Rabbitry stands preeminent as the largest outdoor rabbitry in San Francisco. This in a measure tends to the steady, increasing demands for their stock, as the animals, being raised out-doors, are less liable to the many ills attendant on animals kept indoors. The tendency at present among the breeders is to keep only the high-grade stock, and the masses must be educated to learn that it is only this stock which pays. A great deal of cheap stock is being sold in San Francisco at present to the detriment of the industry. However, the law of the "Survival of the Fittest" will prevail, the weeding out of the unscrupulous vendor, and the Belgian Hare Craze will settle down on a firm basis and continue to be profitable to legitimate breeders. This firm intends to continue their business on the lines already set forth and as a neuclus have gathered the largest number of high scoring does in any one rabbitry in Northern California. Our prices will not be lower than the lowest but they will be right, and our stock can always be returned if not as represented. We have only one method of doing business. A booklet on the care and feeding of Belgians can be had by sending six cents in stamps to Tremont Belgian Hare Co. Office, 2134 Fillmore street Rabbitry, 2428 Sacramento street, San Francisco, Cal. "PRINCE BRITAIN," Owned by H. Pittock of Elmhurst, California.

The best known man in the Belgian Hare world of Central California to-day is Mr. H. Pittock of Pittock's Belgian Hare Rabbitry of Elmhurst, California.

He has demonstrated in a very signal manner what may be done with small capital with these justly popular favorites.

He started in the business in December, '98—fifteen months ago—with one doe and her litter and a cash outlay all told, of less than $25 00; he has since added nothing to the business save his labor and what he has made out of the business, but has drawn out over a thousand dollars, and now h s a plant well worth $2,000, and paying fifty per cent upon $10,000. He has a producing capacity of 200 hares per month and ready sale for double that many, but keeps about 300 always on hand. He is a true fancier and breeder and a thorough master of his business, having followed it in England and the London Fancy Market for years. He is very progressive and is constantly adding choice specimens from the most popular strains to his herd, beside those of his own raising, which compare very favorably with the best.

His present favorites are: Red Ranger, Lord Harding and La Prince Jr. of his own raising, and Prince Britain, King Kitchener and Dandy Rochdale amongst his importations, besides many choice does.

His shipping orders are a surprise to all, extending from the Pacific to the Atlantic, from Florida to Alaska, but he is a hustler, attends strictly to business and fills all orders fairly and promptly. Being a pioneer in this industry in Central California, he obtained the lead and by handling only first class stock and fair dealings has kept it and proposes to endeavor so to do, having given up a lucrative real estate business to give his entire time and best attention to this business.

Visitors are always welcome at his Rabbitry and all correspondence receives prompt attention.

"Teddy Roosevelt,"
Highest Scoring Heavyweight in America.

One of the handsomest and most commodious rabbitries in the region around San Francisco Bay is that owned by F. E. Mason and operated by him at 1710 Everett street, corner Buena Vista avenue, Alameda. Mr. Mason is a breeder of integrity and experience. It is his pride that he breeds only from the best strains, thereby keeping his stock equal to the best. The stud is headed by Lord Essex, by Crabtree, an imported animal which scored 93 at four months old, and Teddy Roosevelt, acknowledged the highest scoring heavyweight buck in America and first prize winner at the Los Angeles show in February. Other notable animals in this exceptional establishment include Dandy Styles, son of Sir Styles, imported, Brittan Prince, a son of the famous Lord Brittan, and General Washington, a son of Starbuck. Besides these high-bred bucks, there are over forty does of high grade. Fine-bred animals, both bucks and does, are for sale at reasonable prices.

Imported "Dash Fire," of the Devonshire Rabbitry.

Devonshire Rabbitry.

One of the finest imported bucks on the Coast, Dash Fire, can be found at the Devonshire Rabbitry, 1081 Capp street, San Francisco. He has recently been imported from England, and is sired by champion Dash out of doe by Grenisby Star. At six months old he scored 94¾ and is deloping in his fine points with maturity. In his rich color, exceptionally long, slender feet and fine ticking and lacing he shows his perfect breeding. The Devonshire Rabbitry has also Lord Britain's Best, a fine buck, and well named, being the best son of his famous sire Lord Britain. They have also a large number of fine does of the best strains and a number of promising Britain youngsters. All the animals in this establishment present a remarkably healthy and well-kept appearance and are finely bred.

W. B. Sink Jr.'s "American Rabbitry"

MAMMA AND BABY

PAPA.

AMONG the many hare establishments which I visited in the past few days the American Rabbitry, in Emeryville, owned by the well known proprietor of the famous thoroughbred flyer Fomero and other great horses, W. B. Sink Jr., is the only one which is an outdoor establishment. I subsequently was given to understand that it is the only rabbitry in this country which is arranged on this plan, and Mr. Sink gives good reasons for it. Said he: "After giving this matter a great deal of study, I concluded to build hutches for the little animals, and you see that they are not constructed in the light, wasted, flimsy order made use of by so many establishments of the kind, but each hutch is of itself a house and home complete, being built not only as a shade for the mid-day sun, but as an absolute protection against wind and rain. Then I believe the rabbits should be raised out of doors as nature intended they should be, so that the stock can at any time be exposed to any reasonable climate without affecting it. In other words I do not believe the animals were intended to be raised as are hothouse plants. I find the plan to work admirably, and when my customers buy the stock I am not afraid that it shall afterward catch cold. Now then, if you want this for publication," said the genial horse owner to a Wave representative, "let me be emphatic on three points which are observed at my establishment. I have two bucks at the head of my stud, which I will not breed to any doe scoring less than 93. This rule is imperative and cast-iron, like the laws of the Medes and Persians. I propose to deal in high-class unimals only, and my rabbitry will always be an outdoor establishment."

And with this introduction Mr. Sink invited me to look over his fine stock and the style of his outdoor premises. I observed that he has shared one-half his entire grounds to the industry, and a general view of it, which is given herewith, shows its situation to better advantage than I could explain it. There are runways for the animals to exercise in and every modern improvement which the brain of the owner could devise. I noticed particularly that the rabbits looked healthy and all of them were lively and playful. There is no stock kept by him which scores under 92, which I presume, is the reason he can command good prices. The stock should also advance and not deteriorate, which could scarcely be said of the ordinary stock known as second and third class animals, which are usually sold for $10 to $20 apiece.

I learned from Mr. Sink that after the 15th of the present month no rabbit for breeding purposes or for sale will be found at his place scoring less than 92, and when he sells rabbits they will be accompanied by an official score card and a registered pedigree. This is something never before carried out in this or any other country. I was not surprised, as only a man who understands thoroughbred horses could devise such a plan.

As a rule parties owning bucks invariably allow them to serve any class of does which may come along accompanied by the money. This in time depreciates the value of a good sire, as with an inferior mother the stock or progeny cannot be more than ordinary.

At the head of his stud are two bucks which even I, a novice, could not but fancy. Americus is a beauty. His sire is the world renowned Champion Dash and his dam the imported Duchess of Leicester, a doe which scored 93 3-4 when a year and a half old, and having at that time a pronounced dewlap and mothered six different litters. Americus at four months old and yet in his baby coat scored 94 1-2, which is within 1 1-2 points of the highest score on record given to bucks of any age. It looks as if he were destined to be a world beater, and from the attention paid to him by his owner, I concluded that he takes as much delight in him as he does in the thoroughbred horse Fomero, for which he refused the handsome sum of $15 000. Then I looked at a buck named after Mr. Sink's favorite flyer, Fomero. This animal is by Champion Fashoda and gives promise of being a prominent rival of his great sire. Neither of these gentlemen will be allowed to serve any animal of the opposite sex unless her ladyship has a score of 93 to her credit. In this way blood, pedigree and points will be scrupulously observed at the American Rabbitry, and young sters si ed by either buch will be a guarantee as to their superior quality.

WHERE THEY LIVE.

Among the other bucks are: Beau Edinboro' by imported Lord Edinboro whose name is sufficient to recommend him. Bannockburn, sired by Lord Banbury I. These, while splendid high scoring animals, will be used for serving does not quite up to the standard insisted upon in the case of the leader of the stud.

The matrons are also of high degree. Princess Xenia, possibly one of the most beautiful animals in this country (Mr. Sink insists that she is without a rival), has a litter running by her side which gives promise of something very extra among the rabbit family. The Princess is but one of many beautiful, high scoring does to be seen at the American, and when Mr. Sink has occasion to import animals money is no object when it comes down to securing the best stock.

Mother's Love

Is boundless. Yet it is utterly helpless to give strength to the child born with a low vitality. The time to give strength to the child is before birth and to impart this gift the mother herself must be strong. Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription gives strength to mothers. It preserves them in robust health in the months before baby comes. It practically does away with the pains of motherhood, and enables the mother to endow her child with a healthy body and a happy disposition. "Favorite Prescription" contains no alcohol and is absolutely free from opium and cocaine.

"I consider Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription the best medicine made," writes Mrs. Mary Murdock, of 220 Taylor St., Topeka, Kansas. "I know it has no equal. I am the mother of ten children and only one living—the tenth one. She is one year old and is as well and hearty as can be. She is a beauty. Of my other babies, some were born at right time, but dead, others were premature births; one lived to be one year old but she was always feeble. I tried different doctors but none of them could tell what my trouble was. I was examined by surgeons but they found nothing wrong. I did not know what to do, so I thought this last time I would try Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription. I took it the entire nine months and now have a fine baby girl, and I can not praise your medicine enough for the good it did me."

As Seen by Leila.

THE DAYS cannot pass too quickly for me now, my dear Diary. Cricket is to be home on the thirtieth of May. I shall be so glad, it is such a trial for me to be the only daughter. Notwithstanding the fact that Cricket is married, she will always be a member of the family. She is the sort of girl that is always ready to go here, there and everywhere with papa, or Arthur, or if the worst comes to the worst, with mama. Naturally mama is too intellectual a woman to find Cricket particularly congenial, but when I am not available mama makes Cricket do. Papa longs for her. Everyday he says, he realizes more and more how much she was to him. I see Cricket's "finish," as she would say herself, we shall be compelled to have Cricket and her Ideal husband come home to live. It will be annoying to mama, but I shall like it. Cricket is a nice little girl, and I really like her husband. These people have enjoyed themselves wherever they went. They have never spent one evening alone. Cricket loves entertaining, and to be entertained, and I think she has had her fling. In her last letter to papa--she writes to him every day--she said she was just a little homesick, and that her husband had promised her two days to go to the country alone with papa.

I have been taking jaunts with him lately. Two nights we stayed over in San Rafael at the hotel. There were a great many people there, and it seemed quite gay, especially out at the Golf Links. There are a good many quite good players now, and I was agreeably surprised to see the number of men who play all day Sunday. I quite approve of the game. It has certainly developed our women to an amazing extent, and made our men less frequent visitors at the city clubs. I disapprove so strongly of clubs for young men. It was decidedly against my approbation that Arthur became a member of the Bohemian Club. I begged papa to deny him that privilege, but papa, like most men, consider a club almost a necessity, and can see no harm in the Bohemian. However, I disapprove, and my husband will never enter the door of any club. But, of course I am a strong minded woman, so is mama, yet papa belongs to three. That, even though it is rather hard on mama, always appeals to my sense of humor.

After we left San Rafael we went down to spend Sunday at the Belvedere Hotel. We had a very good luncheon. There were a great number of people there, more than usual, I think, owing to the yacht races. I never saw a finer looking lot of young fellows. The greater number are real athletes and it is a splendid sight to see them on their yachts and rowing. I do like muscular young men. One of the girls at the hotel told me in the most naive manner possible that no girl ever left Belvedere without being engaged—"and they marry the fellows too"—she said, proving to me it was no summer engagement. I do not blame the girls for liking these fine strong young fell ws; they are certainly attractive. How nice the girls looked, too on Sunday with their smart shirt waists and pique skirts. I do not wonder Belvedere is so popular, it is an exceedingly pretty place. Mama and I shall spend a little while there later on in the season. The formal opening of the hotel takes place Saturday evening. I shall go, for I want to see if the men are as attractive in evening dress as in their boating costumes. If so, I shall stay there just to encourage them in their athletics. Of course a little, too, for my own pleasure.

There were several small teas last week. Bernie Drown had a few of the girls up at her house on Thursday afternoon. Mrs. Homer King had a large tea that same afternoon in honor of Mrs. Collis P. Huntington. It was a most enjoyable affair as Mrs. King had excellent music, singing and recitations. I quite approve of that sort of thing at a tea. Women always feel interested in anything that is anyway cultivating. After I left Mrs. King's, I went to Mrs. Alexander Keyes, to have tea with her. She is an admirable hostess and I feel now that the young married women in San Francisco are becoming more like those in the Eastern cities. It is so nice to find them improving so much. We are to have a good many theatre parties this week. I was asked to three for Monday evening. It rather surprised me, for I am so difficult to please in the way of a man. I insist upon knowing who are to be in the party. One uncongenial person simply spoils my whole evening. I can never adapt myself to a person. I really consider life too short for that sort of thing. That is one of the reasons, perhaps, I am not so popular as Cricket. "To what man would you like to sit next at dinner?" people would telephone to Cricket. She would laugh and say, "It does not matter, if he's not my friend now, he will be before dinner is over." I suppose she is to be envied for having that temperament

I quite enjoyed "The Tyranny of Tears.' It is a clever play and was well acted. Isabelle Irving was such a typical wife. I know so many of my friends who are just as clever in their way as she is. But I became really most interested in Ida Conquest. She is a charming girl and reminded me of one of the girls in Henry James' novels. She is, I think, a typical "James" girl. I was sorry mama was not with me, for I missed her criticisms on the play. The people with whom I went were far less intellectual than I, so of course I could hardly expect them to use any judgment as to the distinct merit of each of the actors. They all liked Drew. I think Drew a fair actor, but it is personal magnetism and his name that fill his houses. The play was quite fair and a piece of pure comedy. Pure comedy is so rare nowadays, I feared lest the greater part of the audience did not understand it. I wanted to have the effrontery of Damrosch, and get up to explain each act to the people so they could be appreciative. I think many of them would have then really enjoyed the play.

I forgot to tell you that Leila Voorhies is to be married to Guy Scott on the 12th of June. It is to be a wedding essentially of her own particular friends. If all I hear be true, their name is legion, for Leila is a popular girl—so the number of cups she has on her table would lead one to believe. The Spreckels girls had a number of young people to tea on Sunday afternoon. I shall be glad when their Pacific avenue house is finished. It is such a long way to go out to their present home. I like their new house, it is so fine and large. Lily Spreckels is a very handsome girl, and looked particularly well on Sunday, so some of the girls told me. I was in Belvedere, so unable to be there.

Only one more letter before me, then you will have your frivolous Cricket to babble to you again. I fear she has not sobered down particularly, and you will not find her changed.

LEILA.

Well Known Belgian Hare Men

The recently elected officers of the San Francisco Belgian Hare Club are: President, George H. Fuller; Vice President, Dr. S. R. Jacobs; Secretary, D. C. Bole; Treasurer, Dr. Ira B. Dalziel. Directors: A. T. Hopke, Alex. McDonald, E. C. Fowler, C. A. Muller, Mrs. E. B. Levey. It has been the desire of the Wave to publish a likeness of Mr. George H. Fuller, the highly esteemed and popular president of the new San Francisco Belgian Hare Club, and the absence of his photograph at the hour of going to press forbids the possibility of the presentation of that gentleman's likeness in this issue. Mr. Fuller is, however, everywhere known as one of San Francisco's soundly established and great merchants.

Dr. S. R. Jacobs is Vice President of the San Francisco Belgian Hare Club and an enterprising man of excellent character. His qualifications as an officer of the largest Belgian Hare Club in the United States are all that can be desired, for he is an organizer of the first class order and up in parliamentary rules. Dr. Jacobs is a native son, born in the City of San Francisco, where he resides, and enjoys a high reputation in his profession of dentistry. He is a graduate of the University of California and one of those genial true gentlemen whom everyone likes to meet.

Dr. S. R. Jacobs

Mr. F. E. Mason, of Alameda, the subject of this brief sketch, is so well and favorably known that he needs no introduction. Mr. Mason is President of the Central California Belgian Hare Club as well as President of the Oakland Poultry Association, and these associations owe much of their great success to his active participation. He is a retired capitalist and finds much enjoyment in the pursuit, as a fancier, of the poultry and Belgian Hare industries. He is recognized as a gentleman of honor in all dealings and those who come in contact with him on both business and social lines are profited thereby. His splendidly appointed rabbitry affords one a treat to visit.

Mr. F. E. Mason.

Mr. Henry Pittock, whose likeness we present herewith, is Vice President of the Central California Belgian Hare Club and one of the most enthusiastic supporters. His energy, thrift and sterling qualities as a man make him a valuable acquisition to the Belgian Hare industry, and for his reliability and fairness in dealings he enjoys an enviable reputation.

Mr. Pittock's rabbitry at Elmhurst as illustrated in another part of this edition, is one of the best stocked in the State, and lovers of the hare find it pleasant and profitable to visit there.

IN BOOKDOM

ALFRED WESLEY WISHART, sometime fellow in church history in the University of Chicago, has, in Monks and Monasteries, given a careful historical sketch of the monastic institution to the time of its practical overthrow in the Reformation period. The beginnings of this institution, like so many other beginnings, are lost in the mists of time; but the work well summarizes what is known of the origin of the monastical spirit. The writer's subject is a large one, but its outlines are made as clear as it is possible to make them within the limits of four hundred pages.

The author has gone to many sources for his materials, and frankly acknowledges his obligations; so that in reality the work is, in part, a compilation, but one in which the compiler has brought to the task a mind unusually free from predisposition or prejudice. Both the good and the evil that sprang from a system of living founded in theory on poverty, chastity, and obedience are fairly presented, and he who wishes to follow the Franciscans or Dominicans through the periods of their poverty and good works; nominal poverty but real wealth; corruption and decay may follow them to his own edification in Mr. Wishart's book.

In the opening chapters, the author deals with monasticism in the East; gives us glimpses of hermit life in Egypt during the early years of the Christian era and tells in a picturesque way of the Cenobites and of St. Simeon aloft on his pillars. He then moves westward and treats at some length of the spread of monasticism in Europe between 340 and 380 A. D. Having in this manner cleared the ground and prepared for his real work, the history of the Benedictines, of the Reformed and Military Orders, of the Mendicant Friars, and of the Society of Jesus is gone into. Then, with his historical facts for premises, he discusses the fall of the monasteries, the causes, the ideals, and the effects of monasticism.

Often the writer presents at too great length historical data that he might better have presumed that the reader knows about, such, for instance, as that concerning the corruption of the Roman Empire or the character of Henry VIII. There is, also, about the book a little too much of the tone of the lecture room, as if a series of talks to students had been somewhat loosely brought together. The matter should have been melted down and run into a more homogeneous mould.

We may differ from some of the conclusions reached by the author; but it is not possible to refrain from again praising the fairness with which he has treated the whole subject. Here is, in a convenient shape, matter for him who wishes to take advantage of the labors of another to inform himself, with little effort, of an intensely interesting side of Christianity.

The book is published by Albert Brandt, Trenton, N. J., and is hondsomely bound in dark red. Perhaps a binding in a more subdued color might better have suited the friars in orders grey, and the others; but the letter press and the hand-sewed, deckle-edged paper are all that the book lover could desire.

Lafcadio Hearn comes to us again out of the mysterious East in In Ghostly Japan. Mr. Hearn has here strung on a Buddhistic thread some Oriental pearls and a few beads of a commoner sort that, with the polish given them by his skillful hands, seem almost to be real gems.

He ranges from a detailed description of the interesting Japanese game of "Incense," where the object of the game is to tell the name of the incense from the odor, to "A Passional Karma," the story of a ghost of a Japanese girl coming from the grave to claim her lover, who is found dead in his room with the bones of the departed maid's arms around his neck. Put in this way, the story has all the crude appearance of graveyard dust; but it is into just such dust that Hearn has breathed the true ghostly spirit that, no doubt, permeates the whole of the Japanese play from which he has taken the tale.

One cannot be always at his best, and at times, as in "Ululation," in which Mr. Hearn tells us what he imagines may possibly be passing in the mind of an old dog that howls without his window, there is reason to think that here is work unworthy of the man, or else that his belief in Karma has carried him far beyond the sympathies of the Western Soul. But turn from "Ululation" to "Silkworms," where the fat catapillars are cared for by one who must seem to them as a Providence, and there is only pure delight in the thoughts themselves and in following the workings of the marvelously delicate mind of that strange man as it weaves the warp of fancy and the woof of man's daily toil into an evolutionary web that stretches from this world to the next, a web of texture finer than grub or man ever before dreamed of spinning.

The book is published by Little, Brown & Co., Boston, Mass. F. R. WALL.

A Low-Price Excursion Through a Charming Country.

The California Northwestern Railway will run an excursion to Ukiah on Sunday, May 27. The fare will be only $2 for the round trip. Each ticket sold guarantees a seat.

A comfortable seat and a quick ride through Marin, Santa Rosa, Russian River and Ukiah valleys, affording a panoramic view of this most picturesque section of California, will make this a most delightful trip.

There has not been a season since 1850 so favorable for the growth of every product of the soil. All plant life this year is exceptional in its development and beauty.

As there will be more than four hours layover in Ukiah there will be ample opportunity for drives in the surrounding country. The livery stables will be prepared to drive persons to Vichy Springs, Indian Rancheria, Asylum and Fish Hatchery of the California Northwestern Railway and other interesting points for a reasonable charge.

The time of departure from Tiburon Ferry, foot of Market street, will be 8:30 a. m., and from Ukiah on the return at 5 p. m. The train both ways will be a special and will not stop at towns in transit.

On page 11 of this edition appears the ad. of the Belgian Hare Medicine Company, who are now placing upon the market the remedies so long recognized by fancy breeders of the Hare in England and Belgium as being the only reliable line of remedies manufactured.

The Famous London Rabbit Remedies are compounded only of such ingredients as are compatible with the nature and habits of the Belgian Hare, and are the results of years of careful study and actual experiments with the hare in England and Belgium.

Noted breeders endorse these remedies as being absolutely faultless. The American breeders will now be given an opportunity for the first time of purchasing these remedies through the druggist, and no rabbitry will be complete without a full line of these remedies in their medicine chest.

THE STANDARD RABBITRY.

Partial View of the Standard Rabbitry.

One of the largest and best-appointed rabbitries on the Pacific Coast is that owned and operated by the Standard Belgian Hare Company of 109 Liberty street, San Francisco. Several remarkably fine animals are owned by this prosperous company. The pick of their stud is Sir Edwin, (imported) a beautiful specimen remarkable for his racy shape and almost perfect coloring. Next on the list is Lady Teazle, who has now a promising litter by Edinboro, and Lady Margaret, bred to an imported buck. The company's hutches contain a great number of high-class does, which they are selling from $5 up. S. C. C. Lunt is the manager, and can be found at the hutches at 109 Liberty street. The salesroom is Stall 103, California Market. Telephsone, Capp 443 (rabbitry).

Have You a Piano that You do not Use?

Is the piano in your home a musical instrument, and do you enjoy it as such, or does it remain unused for months at a time and become practically nothing more than an article of furniture.

The Pianola

Is bringing into use thousands of pianos that have been silent for many years.

It is bringing music into homes where it has long been a stranger.

It is making players of people who, lacking musical training, had never expected to experience the pleasure of producing music for themselves.

It is increasing the repertoire of amateur and professional pianists by making the entire literature of the piano instantly available without study and without practice.

The Pianola looks like a small cabinet. It has small felt-covered fingers that rest on the keys of the piano and, operated by pneumatic power, strike the keys with a pliant, yielding and remarkably sympathetic touch that is almost identical with that of the human fingers.

When not in use the Pianola may be easily detached from the piano and moved to another part of the room.

The Pianola can be used in connection with any Grand or Upright piano, and does not in any way mar or disfigure the instrument. It can be easily and quickly adjusted by any one.

The action of the Pianola is so simple that even a child can readily learn to play it; at the same time it is capable of so much expression that its greatest admirers are those who best understand and appreciate good music.

Price $250 Upward.

The Pianola can be bought by monthly payments. Our instruments are gladly shown to the merely curious as well as to intending purchasers.

Concerning Man's Queerness.

"MEN are so queer," said Dorothy plaintively, holding the end of her scarf away from her face, where the wind was blowing it, and turning to look after a hansom which was gaily carrying one of the tribe up the avenue.

I did not see anything particularly queer about the combination of a man and a hansom. It was something which happened in New York almost every day, and I gave my undivided attention to the gorgeous flare of red roses on the corner behind us. It was the flower stand presided over by the old gray-haired women before whom people always stop and say, "Oh, what a fine sketch she would make." I resisted the red roses as long as I could. "I wonder if I happen to have money enough?" I murmured finally, opening my purse. But I had not!

"It is surprising to find out how many things one can really do without," said Dorothy, with the air of a stoic. "Why, I have been getting along all this winter with just two white satin stocks," and then she sighed deeply and said again, "Men are so queer."

I gave up then. I had suspected from the first that Dorothy was in one of her black moods. When anything goes wrong with Dorothy, or she gets discouraged in any way, she falls into the deepest kind of pessimism about men, and indulges in dark innuendoes about the sex. Why, I have never been able to learn, for men are apt to like Dorothy. I tried to look at her sympathetically, as if I too felt the weight of their idiosyncrasies, but just then a woman in a pretty hat which we both wanted to see passed, and the car for which we had been waiting stopped for us, and between the two we had all we could do for the next few moments. Once aboard, however, comfortably hanging to the straps and with the hat far behind us, Dorothy's remark recurred to me.

"Why do you think men are so queer?" I asked her, loud enough for the man who was sitting down in front of me, buried in his newspaper, to hear. It was natural that he should look at me, and equally natural that I should not see that look. But this question was all that Dorothy wanted. Emerson speaks somewhere of "the sentence to contain which the piece was written." Just so does Dorothy often talk a long time in order to finally say something she really wants to say, and has intended to say all along. She clasped her hand around her strap firmly. "Men," she said oracularly, "are like nettles. You must grasp them tightly, if you don't want to be hurt."

The newspaper tilted a little.

"What do you mean?" I asked, sitting down suddenly in the capacious lap of a stout lady behind me—the conductor had just admonished us to "hold fast," and I had failed to do so.

"I mean there is just one attitude for a woman to preserve toward a man," said Dorothy, helping me up. "If she gives that up once, she is lost. Man likes to pursue. It is a trait of the cave days when he chased her for a mile or two, hit her on the back of her head with his club and bore her off to share his sorrows—I don't think there could have been much joy in those days. But women are constantly forgetting this, and ignore the fact that he has really been doing it in one way or another ever since and likes it. It is one of the ineradicated instincts of the days primeval, and there are other ways to knock a woman down besides hitting her with a club. So don't you see that if a woman just keeps herself in that attitude where a little pursuit is necessary, Nature is obeyed and a nice adjustment follows. I tell you there is a basic law at the bottom of it."

Dorothy made such a long pause that our car had time to run into a truck and bring about a conversation between the gripman and truck driver that opened up undreamed-of possibilities of the English language. The passengers could only look at each other apologetically. "Oh, go on, Dick; you're all right," said the conductor, soothingly, to the gripman.

"Well?" I said to Dorothy, interrogatively.

She wrinkled up her brows and lowered her voice. "Do you know that when a woman humbles herself before a man she makes the greatest mistake of her life? There is a certain amount of brutality in every man. It may be very marked in some, and not very apparent in others, but it is there, and it crops out the minute he thinks he has a little power over anybody. It is in the masculine blood. Why, I remember an old house servant at my aunt's in the South, old Uncle John, who was ordered around by everybody on the place. He had authority over one living thing, and that was an old gray horse that had outgrown service. It is the truth that about once a month he took that old horse out and beat it. He just had to do it, you know, because he could. And that is the way it is with every man."

Here the man behind the newspaper arose hastily and went out to the back platform, where he watched us steadily as if he suspected us of some dark design on his sex. We divided between us the seat he had left, and gave our attention for a moment to a most beautiful thing a young woman was wearing at her throat; a Greek head cut out of solid turquoise.

"I don't like it with that hat," said Dorothy severely.

"Dorothy," I asked suddenly, "have you been humbling yourself to a man?"

Dorothy simply ignored my question. "Now, there is the case of my cousin Betty from the South," she said airily, as if she had been talking about cousins ever since we met. "You know she came up to stay a couple of months with me last winter. Now you know how Southern girls are, don't you? They want every man in sight, and then they let each man know—by innuendoes and all those things—that all the other men are dying for them. That is what you have to expect from Southern girls, and what you have to stand, too—and it is a good deal sometimes; though, of course, that depends on the men. There are times when I am very glad to let the Southern girls have every man in sight."

"I have been South," I said.

"Well, then, you know what it is. Of course, Cousin Betty had very sweet little ways; she used to get homesick for her mother, and all that and it was not any time at all before two or three men were in love with her, and she became engaged to one of them. He was a nice man, too," she broke off abruptly, and I fancied there was a suggestion of tears about her voice, not then, but away back some time, certainly tears about that man. "A nice man," she continued after a moment; "one of the nicest men I ever knew. He had been a friend of mine for years. I thought I knew him thoroughly, but it seems I did not, for I never thought he was the kind of a man to fall in love with Cousin Betty, and that is exactly what he did, or thought he did. I never really believed he did."

Here Dorothy studied her right glove intently for a minute. "The very first thing she did," she continued, "was to make him think that there was another man, a friend of his, who loved her and wanted her. And of course he did not like that. Even if he did not want her very much himself, it made him angry to think that another man wanted to take her away from him; and then that made him think he wanted her all the more—and of course, that was just what she wanted, just to gratify her vanity. I know she never really cared for him. Well, things went on this way until one day, to cut a long story short, she wrote him from Podunk—it was summer by this time and she had gone up there—that this man, his friend, had been up that week to see her. This made him desperately angry, because he happened to know that his friend had not been near Podunk all week, and he sat down and wrote her a very short letter telling her what he thought of it. He came and told me all about it the next day, and, do you know, that man was simply frightened to death. He was afraid that he had been too harsh. She was such a dear little girl and had been made so much of she could not help having her little vanities, and this was one of them. He was in a mood to be moulded like putty. He thought Betty might break the thing off and the other man would get her after all. You can see what a fine opportunity it was for Betty. But what did Betty do? Why, Betty was foolish and lost her head. I believe she did care a little for him, after all. At any rate she made the mistake of humbling herself. She wrote him by return post. She begged him to overlook her vanity, she begged him to forget her foolishness, and she begged him, above all, to forgive her. I wish you could have seen him when he got the letter. He was the most deeply wronged man in the world. He said that the way she had treated him was something outrageous; he did not see how he could ever forgive her, and that she had not only betrayed herself, but she had given him aspects of her sex that he had never dreamed of."

Dorothy put her hand on mine, and we laughed together. "I give you my word," she said, with the smile still around her mouth, "that he was the nicest man I have ever known, and yet he acted this way, and just because she had given him the opportunity."

"How did it end?" I asked.

"How could it end?" answered Dorothy, motioning to the conductor to let us off. "There was only one way in which it could end. He made an opening for her to do just one thing, and that was to break the engagement. And yet I shall always think that if she had written him a different letter they would have been married. I am not speaking of the desirability of such an event."

We got off the car and paused in front of a florist's window to look at some Scotch heather and see if our hats were on straight. "So that is why men are queer," I said.

"Well, no," replied Dorothy, reddening slightly; "you see, it is this way. That man had never said a tender word to me in all his life, and yet I had always wanted him to. And last night he came to see me and—and he said it. But don't you see that he would never have said it if Cousin Betty had never written him that letter? A thing like that is only valuable when it happens of itself, and is not dependent on something else. When love is not all, it is nothing. It ceases to be love, and begins to be something else. So when he said those words I have been waiting years to hear him say; these words that I have dreamed over and longed for as only a woman can; when the moment came that I have always told myself would be the great moment of my life—all this rushed over me, and I looked at him with clear eyes, and felt that there had never been a moment when I cared less for him."

There was silence for a few moments between us. "Dear, dear," I said finally. "You are hurt; now don't be. I can give you three good rules about men that a woman ought never to forget. I will give you the third one first, and that is that there is always——"

"It is too late for all that now," interrupted Dorothy.

A sudden suspicion seized me. "Dorothy," I said firmly, "now tell me what you want to—the real thing, mind you. You have been working up to it ever since we got off the car."

A wave of red surged over her face. She hesitated just a moment, then turned toward me squarely and pulled off her left glove. I looked at her bared hand and saw that all the rings she had been wont to wear had come off, but on the third finger was a new ring—very, very new.

"Do you know, I think it is women who are queer, after all," I said, with some irritation.

AT THE THEATERS

THAT we are willing to pay the New York price for a New York performance has been demonstrated. John Drew has done the proving. He came for but a week with but a single play and a company of but seven players, and he charged two dollars for an opportunity to look at him, and, what is more to the point, got it. So here we are redeemed in name. No longer can it be said that San Francisco is a dollar town, a jay place filled with jays, the capital of the country of the Yaps and the social centre of the Yahoos. For we have been tried and not found wanting. We have paid the limit for three hours of quiet social study; a spoken chapter from Henry James; not a home on the stage, nor a midnight scene, not a gown from Paris, at least not so advertised, not a woman who had ever had a man killed for love of her, not even one of the men who publishes the love letters of school girls; nothing the whole evening long but a small family passing through a not uncommon situation, and yet we enjoyed it and went home glad that Drew had come to San Francisco, hoping he would come again.

If there ever was a play that is not spectacular it is "The Tyranny of Tears," and it is played by the most reserved lot of people that one could wish to see. The gallery, if there was one, never found where to extend the rejoicing hand. There was no applause, or just the faintest under tone, for there was nothing to cause emotion, nothing to arouse sympathy, sorrow or hatred. Only a woman bullying her husband by weeping —that's all. And the husband in the end gets tired, and says so, and the woman is contrite when the curtain falls. Then you know the play. But how well they all did their work,—players of precision every one.

Every woman has some pet form of blackmail. That is axiomatic. They "hold up" the man in some way and achieve results. The work is artistic, generally. It is directed against the man's weakness. The professional blackmailer of commerce discovers an affair which the public will not endorse and levies tribute as the price of silence. The amateur of the hearth threatens return to mother or a hint to a strict and straight-laced governor, or, worse still, destroys the nerves and drives all peace to the devil by resort to tears. Men are cowards,—that is the first text in woman's bible. Men will sacrifice anything to avoid a scene. Therefore, if you would have your way, dear sister, open the flood-gates, press the hysteria button and the trick is turned. Oh, how easily the thing is done! But one day you go too far; the worm gets over on his back and kicks. Then there's a fight,—woman's system against man's aroused pride and self-respect. And the man wins if he has fortitude. This is the philosophy of "The Tyranny of Tears." It is a play for men, married men particularly. A play at which they may see themselves and be ashamed. Women with a high sense of humor might enjoy it, because it is a trim, air-tight piece of work, clever in its lines and not a line to spare. But no self-respecting woman could applaud enthusiastically a piece so well calculated to lessen her power and reveal the scant springs of her successes. As well might you expect the spiritualistic medium to shout with joy and delight as the informed medium reveals the secret pockets in the cabinet and the trap door through which "papa" is materialized. If I had a wife I would take her to see Drew; well, perhaps on second thought it wouldn't be worth while, she might never know she was being guyed, "poor, sweet thing."

If John Drew was to leave the stage what could he do? Look at him there; dressed so well, so perfect a gentleman in manner. What place have we for such as he in American society except the misty and dreamy half-life of the stage? What could John Drew do off the stage? He could, of course, seek that last resort of all incapables and marry a rich wife, some Burlingame miss with millions, and drive tandem and make one of that polo-playing number, whom Ed. Hamilton described at the Bohemian jinks. He couldn't practice love except like my dear friend Wordii for a club window. He might be a fashionable doctor, yes that might do, and he would look so well driving out Van Ness at a terrible pace, as if Croesus were dying, and turning on some side street and driving back reading letters as if such duties couldn't be found time for in the office or at home. These dear doctors, what a clever lot! Certainly, Drew would be a popular one. But no matter what he might be off the stage, he is the finest walking gentleman on it. So goodbye to you dear stiff-backed friend, we like you and your people, especially Miss Conquest.

DE SIVEX.

San Francisco looks forward with pleasure to the reappearance of Nat Goodwin and Maxine Elliott in their new play "When We Were Twenty-one" by H. V. Esmond. Parts have been specially adapted to the talent of the two principals and they are said to appear to their best advantage in the coming production. An excellent supporting company include the following: Frank Gillmore, Ysobel Haskins, Clarence Handyside, Harry Woodruff, Estelle Mortimer, Neil O'Brien, Gertrude H. Gheen, Thomas Oberle, L. E. Woodthorpe and others. The production is by far the most elaborate ever attempted by Mr. Goodwin and is identically the same as that seen during the winter season at the Knickerbocker theatre.

An attractive bill is promised for the Orpheum next week. Lillian Burkhart will be well supported in "A Deal on Change," a one-act skit. Miss Burkhart is well known on the legitimate stage and in local society circles. "Vandy," a London success, will show San Francisco several new things in juggling. Midgley and Carlisle will appear in a rural juvenile comedy entitled, "After School." Miss Carlisle is well known to San Francisco theatre goers, having received her early training in a local stock company. The holdovers are: Mignani Family, Barthe, Wilson Family, Louise Gunning and the biograph.

The Neill Company will close their eight weeks successful engagement at the California next week with the repetition of the plays which have scored the greatest hits. Sunday, Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday nights and Wednesday (Memorial Day) afternoon "Lord Chumley" will be played. "Captain Letterblair" will be revived for the Thursday matinee. "A Bachelor's Romance" will be played by request Thursday evening. The remainder of the week will be devoted to the popular "Captain Swift."

* *

Henry Miller will be here during July and August. Among his support will appear Frank Worthing, now in London, and Frank E. Lamb, at present with John Drew.

Dunne and Ryley's all star cast will begin a ten weeks engagement at the California Theatre on Sunday night, June 3rd. Hoyt's "A Rag Baby" will be the opening attraction.

Frank Daniels is soon to appear in this city in "The Ameer." He will bring Helen Piedmont with his company.

Nance O'Neil has completed her Australian engagement and will be here again in September.

"Miss Hobbs" is to be produced here with Margaret Anglin in the title role.

Kellar, the magician, will be with us next month.

There is more Catarrh in this section of the country than all other diseases put together, and until the last few years was supposed to be incurable. For a great many years doctors pronounced it a local disease, and prescribed local remedies, and by constantly failing to cure with local treatment, pronounced it incurable. Science has proven catarrh to be a constitutional disease, and, therefore, requires constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure, manufactured by F. J. Cheney & Co., Toledo, Ohio, is the only constitutional cure on the market. It is taken internally in doses from 10 drops to a teaspoonful. It acts directly on the blood and mucous surfaces of the system. They offer one hundred dollars for any case it fails to cure. Send for circulars and testimonials. Address,

For Ladies, from 9 a. m. to 9 p. m.

The Orignal Swain's Bakery, 213 Sutter St., stands without a rival and has stood the test for years. The most delicious meals are served by gentlemanly attendants, and the management takes pride in having everything orderly. It is just the place for business men and ladies out shopping to-lunch.

New Stories Re-Told.

A POOR EMPLOYER.—"Nick o' the Woods" is the name by which an Oregonian lumber-king is known to the army of woodsmen who labor in his northern forests. So vast are the holdings of this magnate that there are many corners of his domain which he has never seen, and there are many workmen who have toiled for years under his supervision, yet never looked upon the face of the man who employs them. One day, recently, the old gentleman was driving through a densely-wooded canyon when his road was blocked by an ox which a venerable forester was goading into action. "Hello, my man!" said Nick o' the Woods, "whose ox is that you have there?" "B'longs to the feller I work fer," replied the other. "And who, pray, is your employer?" persisted the capitalist blandly. "Nick o' the Woods, the —— —— —— old skinflint!" answered the woodman as he gave the ox another vicious cut.

x

THE INJURED PARTY.—A certain newspaper man of this city is noted for his clothes, which are numerous as the sands of the sea and resplendent as the colors of the rainbow. Another quality which renders him more or less intimately acquainted with a certain class is the slowness—the extreme slowness—with which he pays for the above distinguished wardrobe. The other day a long suffering tailor man called and asked if Mr. Blank would be so kind as to give him a few dollars cash. "How much do you want?" asked the debtor. "Forty-five dollars if you can spare it," replied the tailor meekly, "I have a large bill to meet tomorrow." "I think it's mighty cheeky of you to come here and ask me to pay your bills," remarked Blank in agrieved tone as he showed his creditor to the door.

IN KENTUCKY.—An Eastern politician was travelling on horseback through a country district in Kentucky lately. As night came on he stopped at a wayside hotel and enquired of the landlord if a night's lodging were available. "What's yer business, stranger?" asked the lank proprietor. "I'm a politician," answered the traveller. "Don't believe yer!" remarked the incredulous host. "Why, if you want to take my word for it," said the politician, "I'll show you my credentials." "Credentials be hanged," was the curt reply. "Where's your gun?"

x

NO WONDER.—Two young clergymen sat together at a lecture given by Rev. B. Fay Mills in this city a short time ago. As the speaker mounted the rostrum, the first divine remarked to his brother that a look of worriment seemed to ruffle the wonted placidity of Mr. Mills' brow. "Mr. Mills has cause to worry," said the second divine. "He has found a new theory of justification to justify his former departure from religious paths. How to justify his justification is the problem that now confronts the poor dear man."

x

COULDN'T UNDERSTAND IT.—At the first performance of "The Lady of Lyons" in the Temple City, Brigham Young bought thirteen seats in the second row, orchestra, and brought his twelve better halves to see the classic drama. At the close of the second act, however, Brigham and his family arose as a unit and filed out of the house. At the door the much-worried business-manager accosted the prophet. "Not going, Mr. Young, I hope?" "Yes," replied the Mormon, as he led away his twelve. "I can't see why they're making all that fuss over one woman!"

SAVE YOUR BULLETS.—At a practice meet held by a local Scheutzen verein at Scheutzen Park lately, a new range was established and much inaccurate shooting restricted. In vain the marksmen of the club sighted with practiced eye and blazed away at the evasive bull's eye. Scores were abominable. At length a corpulent rifleman grounded his piece and, shaking his fist at the distant target till the medals on his chest rattled and clinked, he cried; "Stop it, chentlemen! Stop dot shooting mit pullets! Plaze avay mit plank gartridges till you gits der range, den pang avay and plow 'em to plazes!"

x

HIS DISAPPOINTMENT.—During Paderewski's last week in this city, just as he was about to enter the carriage which was to bear him from the theatre to his private car, he was stopped by a slender youth who evidently had something of importance to say. "Are you Mr. Paderewski?" asked the young man breathlessly. "Yes," replied the distinguished Pole, "What is it that you wish?" "Are you the feller that plays the piano?" persisted the boy. "Yes." "Pshaw!" he sighed, almost, tearfully as he turned away, "I read in the papers that you got a hair-cut!"

CHAMPION BELGIAN HARE SANITARY HEADQUARTERS.

1009½ SUTTER STREET, SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

One of the best sanitary inventions which has lately come into practical use, is the SANITARY, SELF-CLEANING HARE HUTCH, (see engraving on this page) for which a patent has been applied for by the inventors, Halfpenny and Marsh of Los Angeles, Cal. The future of the Belgian Hare, either as a fancy or as a meat proposition, largely depends on the cleanliness of his little home. Many persons have probably been deterred from Hare raising because of noting the disgusting and slovenly manner in which the hares are maintained in the old style hutches.

The new, Sanitary Hutch, has many advantages over the old one; it makes the raising of Belgian Hares pleasing as well as profitable, and really meets the wants of the most fastidious, for so far as cleanliness and odor is concerned, a Sanitary Hutch full of Hares would not be a nuisance in even the dwelling of the owner; it is self cleaning, for all the droppings are disposed of automatically, and it is convenient, handsome and entirely sanitary; in it the hares are so kept that disease is practically impossible and the customary drudgery of caring for these little pets is obviated and their raising becomes a pleasure.

The economical question is completely solved, for one person can easily care for a large number of hutches, and the saving in food becomes quite an item, while the beauty and fine points of the fur remain unimpaired.

The many advantages of these hutches was immediately appreciated by Capitalists, Blooded-Hare breeders and expert Fanciers, who noted their general economy and usefulness and especially the fact that the Hares show to so much better advantage in these large, light and clean apartments, as distinguished from the cramped, dark and filthy boxes found in most so-called 'rabbitries

The first cost is not large, and the numerous advantages possessed by the SANITARY HUTCH readily compensate for any additional expense.

Unsanitary conditions in Hare raising are already engaging the attention of the Health Departments, as is shown by the fact that one of the largest and lattest Rabbitries in San Francisco, and containing very fine, imported stock, was condemned as a nuisance by the Health Board Inspectors, ordered abated within 48 hours, and the owner was forced to sell out his whole establishment at a very great loss.

The fact that one large Rabbitry, containing much valuable stock, has already been burned to cinder, caused the Fire Insurance Companies to object to ordinary hutches within the city limits, owing to the bulk of straw, saw-dust and other rubbish constantly accumulating.

Belgian Hare breeding and raising can be done by any person, young or old, and this so-called "fad" may yet be utilized for higher moral purposes and personal culture, in the keeping of young people employed in a legitimate enterprise, instead of as in many instances, following the races, the hounds frequenting pool-rooms and other degrading sports and amusements; even the ordinary cat or dog-pets, may be superseded by "bunnies," when their care is simplified and made entirely easy by the use of these Sanitary Hutches. Breeders of fine Hares acknoweledge that the meat and the fur of the animals raised in these Hutches is necessary of superior quality, as compared with the old style.

An establishment along the lines mentioned and of a greatly improved type has been inagurated at 1009 1-2 Sutter Street, San Francisco, by Dr. D. A. Hiller, a connoiseur of Belgian Hare stock, and merits the inspection of all lovers of the handsome little animals; this is a model in all respects, and while following the general form of the Halfpenny and Marsh Hutch, the sanitary, economical and altogether pleasing features have been combined to make this, the

CHAMPION BELGIAN HARE SANITARY HEADQUARTERS.

The Agent for these hutches can be found at the same place, and would-be buyers of fine BLOODED BELGIAN HARES, will do well to call here and inspect the beautiful "bunnies" offered before making their purchases, as none but the finest stock is kept for sale.

An ABSOLUTE "Snuffle and Slobbers" Cure is also for sale at 50 cents per bottle; one bottle being enough for a whole rabbitry.

Aguinaldo Reported Dead.

Emilio Aguinaldo, Chief of the Filipino insurgents and, by that bad eminence, one of the most notorious men in public affairs during the past two years, is supposed to have reached the end of his career. One of the scouting bands of American troops which have been following the trail of the insurgeant chief during the past six months caught up with his party on May 19 and killed or severely wounded the officer in charge. Circumstantial evidence strongly indicates that this person was Aguinaldo. Major March's detachment of the Thirty-third Infantry is credited with the achievement. They had been pressing the party of the rebel chief for about two weeks. On May 19, they attacked and drove in his outposts. Just at sunset, they swept into the town of Legat, scattering the native force before them. On a hill about a thousand yards away, they saw a body of about twenty-five Filipinos, from their dress evidently men of consequence. Their leader was on horseback. Suspecting that he was Aguinaldo himself, the Americans fired a volley which brought him down from his saddle. The Filipinos took up the body and got away in the gathering darkness. The horse from which the man had fallen was captured. It was richly caparisoned and in the blood-stained saddle-bags were the diary and other private papers of Aguinaldo. This is the strongest circumstantial evidence. Pushing further on, the Americans learned two days later that the same native party had rafted down the river on May 20, carrying a dead body, covered with leaves. These bits of evidence are not entirely conclusive, but it is a fair presumption that the misguided Tagala chieftan is out of the way. The papers captured show that he has been a fugitive for many months, having little to do with the direction of affairs and dodging from district to district in continual peril from the wild and hostile Iogorotes, who have murdered many of his followers. Outside of this, there has been little activity in the Philippines lately. The Philippine Commission has arrived at Manila and begun its work. General Otis has landed at San Francisco and given vent to the new and original opinion that the war is over. General MacArthur, replying to a Congressional query about the number of natives killed in the war reports: "Filipinos killed 10,780; wounded, 2014; captured and surrendered, 10,424. Number of prisoners in our possession, about 2000. No systematic record of Filipino casualties at these headquarters. The foregoing is compiled from reports made immediately after engagements, and is as close an approximation as is possible, owing to the wide distribution of the troops. The number reported killed is probably in excess of the accurate figures; the number reported wounded probably much less, as the Filipinos managed to remove most of the wounded from the field and comparatively few fell into our hands." The Federal Volunteers having enlisted only until June, 1901, preparations are already being made to bring them home before the term of enlistment expires, replacing them with regulars. To do this, part of the garrison in Cuba will have to be withdrawn. There are now 62,000 troops in the Philippines, equally divided between regulars and volunteers; the permanent garrison will consist of about 40,000 regulars.

The Strike at St. Louis Continues.

The street car strike at St. Louis has settled into a long conflict between the police and the company on one side and the strikers on the other. Since the former gained their point by sending their cars through under non-union carmen, riots and squabbles have been of continual occurrence. Hardly a day has passed but that some policemen, striker, militiaman or innocent bystander has been killed or injured. The night of May 30, 31, there were six such fatalities. Twice, an attempt has been made to blow up the car-barns, where many employees and policemen are quartered, by dynamite, and attempts to wreck and derail trains have been common. The militia and the police have been entrusted with keeping order. They proved themselves inadequate in the early days of the strike, however; their numbers were hardly sufficient and their general sympathy with the strikers rendered their work half-hearted. This led the sheriff of the county to resort to an unusual measure. By the laws of Missouri, he has the right to summon any reputable citizen as an emergency deputy. He decided to avail himself of this law, and to enroll a posse of 2,500 solid and respectable business and professional men who could be entrusted to enforce order without prejudice. Naturally, the class of citizens which he desired to enroll have attempted to evade duty; nevertheless, he has managed to enlist about 1,000 and is going on with the work. The citizens of the city have had much to do with the strike on both sides. The laboring classes have, of course, been all for the strikers, and have taken a hand in the disorders of the past two weeks. A deputation from the district inhabited mainly by this class sent an ultimatum to the company last week, declaring that if the police and non-union employees were not disarmed at once, they themselves would attend to the matter—"to protect our wives and children." On the other hand, a committee of solid and influential citizens have been striving for a compromise. They have held several meetings with representatives of the company, the strikers and Governor Stone, who is on the ground trying to adjust matters. On June 2, they submitted a proposal embodying the return of all the strikers to their situations, and the employ of union men only, no advance in wages to be made. This was accepted by the company, and it was thought that the strikers would accept these terms, as they had already lost the points for which they were contending, but the committee refused and affairs stand as they were. Stone and the citizen's committee are, however, still working for a compromise.

The Chinese Crisis Grows Alarming.

The Boxer insurrection in China has assumed such proportions as to alarm all the Powers and to threaten the existence of the present Chinese government. At present, the great city of Pekin, capital and metropolis of the Empire, is menaced by the advancing horde of rioters. The disloyal and disorganized Chinese army is doing little in defence of the capital, the only force available being a handful of marines from the allied fleets in the harbor of Taku. The rioters have worked toward Pekin all the week, killing native Christians and destroying railroads and other European improvements as they advanced. In the early days of the insurrection, the foreigners escaped, but there have been many fatalities among missionaries and engineers during the week. One English party was set upon and four were killed and four wounded before they were rescued by a detachment of European troops. Another party of eleven engineers is missing and although a detachment of Cossacks was sent in search of them, they have left no trace. Still other parties, known to be stationed in the disturbed district, have failed to materialize in the cities to which most of the Europeans have fled and grave fears are held for their safety. The Chinese government is doing little; all resistance comes from the Europeans. The ultimatum from the allied Ministers, demanding that foreign marines be permitted to defend the consulates at Pekin, expired June 1. China yielded, and 300 marines of various nationalities, with five guns, were rushed by railroad from Taku to Pekin. The situation growing more serious and the Boxers having been reported close to Pekin, additional marines were rushed to both the Capital and Tien Tsin. Minister Conger and Admiral Kempff, representing the United States, have cabled for more troops and a gunboat. They unite in pronouncing the situation most critical. It is apparent that some hidden hand is guiding the Boxers. In the first outbreak, German political critics asserted that Great Britain had raised the disturbance in order to have an excuse for siezing a point near Pekin, and had been frustrated by the action of the Powers in making it an international matter. The continuance of the trouble goes to disprove this assertion. The action of Russia has been suspicious all through. She has nine warships at Taku against three or less for ony other one power, has eleven thousand troops on the border within short march of Pekin and holds fourteen thousand in readiness at Port Arthur. The fact that such forces were in a position to take the field argues a foreknowledge on Russia's part. But most suspicious of all is the attitude of the Chinese government. The troops have made but feeble resistance, even for Chinese, the Cabinet has tried to prevent foreigners from landing marines, and it has just been discovered that the governors of provinces are instructed to treat the rioters with all "gentleness." It looks like a part of the Empress' reactionary and anti-foreign policy. If so, it means the near break-up of China and the end of the Tartar dynasty.

The Boer War.

The announcement made last week that Pretoria was taken was premature. Nevertheless, the Boer capital is now in the hands of the British, who gained it after some sharp fighting. Simultaneously comes the news that in the preliminary fighting they lost a battalion of yeomanry, taken prisoners. Roberts, after taking Johannesburg, threw his advanced columns toward Pretoria. It seems that upon the approach of the British column, the Boers were at first in favor of evacuating the city peaceably. But warlike counsels prevailed, for some reason or other, and the usual Boer masked fire from small arms and artillery met the invaders outside the city. The British troops attacked with spirit; their loss was heavy, but after a day's hard fighting, they forced the place and occupied it. The Transvaal army withdrew into the mountains toward Watervalhoven, taking their women and most of the British prisoners which had been kept at Pretoria. The official entry was made June 5, and the news set all Great Britain wild. The motive of the rather weak defence put up by the Boers—considering that the place is most strongly fortified and should withstand almost any siege—is still greatly in doubt. From Boer sources it is reported that the battle before the town was simply a disturbance kicked up by the rear guard to hold the British off until the main body could get away. This same report adds that the Boers evacuated with intention, believing that their best chance lay in keeping up guerilla tactics in the mountains. This opinion is rather weakened in force by the fact that Mrs. Kruger and Mrs. Botha were both captured inside the town. Had the Boers been withdrawing deliberately, it would seem that they would have taken the wives of their commanders with them. It is too early yet to judge of motives. Meanwhile, Robert's advance guard is following the retreating burghers into the mountains.

The House Anti-Trust Bill.

Just before adjournment, the House of Representatives passed an anti-trust bill. This body had already beaten a constitutional amendment giving Congress the right to regulate, licence and control such industrial combinations. The new bill was passed with only one dissenting voice—Mann (R) of Illinois. In effect, it only increases the old Sherman law. It provides that anyone conspiring to create any combination tending to restrain commerce between the states or with other countries is guilty of a crime, and may be punished for each offence by a fine of not less than $500 nor more than $5000, or by imprisonment for not less than six months nor more than six years, or by both. The definition of "person" and "persons" in the present law is enlarged so as to include the agents, officers or atttorneys of corporations. For purposes of commerce it declares illegal all corporations or associations formed or carrying on business for purposes declared illegal by the common laws; provides that they may be perpetually enjoined from carrying on interstate commerce, and forbids them the use of the United States mails. It provides for the production of persons and papers, and confers jurisdiction upon United States Circuit and District Courts for the trial of causes under it, and authorizes any person, firm or corporation or association to begin and prosecute proceedings under it. The Democrats proposed a number of amendments with socialistic trend. Only one of these went through, a clause providing that the law shall not be construed so as to brand labor-unions as trusts. The fact that this bill went through the House just before adjournment, when too late for the Senate to take it up and make it a law until after the Presidential campaign, is being used as ammunition by the yellow branch of the Democratic press. It is pretty certain that anti-trust agitation will be a leading Democratic argument this fall. Such being the case, the Democratic papers assert that the measure was passed by the Republican House just at the edge of adjournment in order to knock this position from under the feet of the Democrats.

Work of Congress During the Session.

The session of Congress ended June 6, leaving a record for work unsurpassed by any previous Congress. It is true that many measures of great importance have been passed over or laid upon the table until next year, but this meeting of our national legislators had more work piled up before it than any previous one since this was a nation. A resume of the work accomplished may be of interest:—The total list of appropriations was about $700,000,000, a little more than the average. The Financial Act, which definitely settled this country on a gold basis, was probably the greatest achievement of the year. This measure was passed with comparatively little haggling. Not so with the Porto Rico bill, the measure next greatest in importance. One clause in this act, that imposing a duty of 15 per cent. on the Dingley schedule, made all the trouble. In the end, it passed. The bill, besides providing for the tarif, creates a provisional civil government for the island, limits corporate franchises, and provides that the revenues collected since American occupation shall be applied for the improvement of Porto Rico. Next in importance was the bill providing for the government of Hawaii. This is territorial in form, with an appointed governor, an educational qualification for the franchise and a congressional delegate who has a voice in Congress but no vote. In executive session, the Senate has made and discussed several important treaties. Of these the treaties with Great Britain and Germany closing the triparite government in Samoa and awarding to the United States the island of Tutuila, with its valuable harbor of Pago-Pago, has been ratified, while the commercial reciprocity treaties with France and the British West Indian islands and the Hay-Pauncefote treaty concerning the interocoanic canal go over without action. The Nicaragua canal measure and the shipping subsidy bill have been threshed over and the problems presented have been greatly simplified, but no final and definite action has been taken, although the canal measure went through the House. Cuba and the Philippines were passed over, the latter being the occasion of much fruitless debate. A new army bill does away with "Algerism," and another measure designed to limit this tendency still further by making staff and bureau service alternate goes over into next session. The Senate has provided for a Pacific cable, but the measure has not passed the House. The general pension laws have been considerably changed, always on the side of liberality. The free homes act becomes a law, and throws open large tracts in old Indian reservations to ordinary homestead proceedings. The Alaska code bill, providing laws for the Northern Territory, has passed both houses and needs only the President's signature to become a law. Considerable general legislation is carried on appropriations. These provisions include the amendments to the military academy bill, making the commanding General of the army a Lieutenant-General and the Adjutant-General of the army a Major-General; also the amendment to sundry civil bills appropriating $5,000,000 for the St. Louis Exposition. Both of these bills are still pending. The naval appropriation bill adds two battleships, three armored cruisers, three protected cruisers and five submarine boats to the naval strength and may include special legislation as to armor plate and a government plant. The other appropriation bills, in the main, carry the usual government supplies. The usual number of small appropriations and measures of minor importance went through. Taken all in all, it was a quiet but energetic session, and probably holds the record for work accomplished. The main factors in waste of time were the Porto Rican tariff debate and the contests over seats in the two houses.

Editorial Comment.

Senator Perkins and His Traducers.

THE California Republicans who will object to the appointment of M. M. Estee to the position of United States District Judge at Honolulu are very few. The Wave has opposed Mr. Estee in some of his political ambitions, but the opposition was not so much directed against the individual as it was against his unfortunate surroundings. We believe Mr. Estee to be well meaning. He was ambitious politically, but he lacked the qualities that bring personal political success. That Mr. Estee will make an acceptable judge we do not for a moment doubt. He is stronger as a lawyer than he is as a politician, and it is not thinkable that he will carry the faults of the latter into his judicial life. We congratulate the gentleman and feel confident a conservative career upon the bench will confound his enemies, who fail to distinguish between Estee the politician and Mr. Estee the lawyer.

Besides being qual fied by ability, the misfortunes that have overtaken him in his old age are calculated to awaken sympathy in the breasts of most men who have any red blood in their veins. Political defeat has been his lot. Ambition after ambition has been swept from out of his reach; associates have proven treacherous and ungrateful, designing men have stolen his legal business; his beautiful home ranch, which represented years of toil and savings, has been taken from him for debt. He has lost in death those whom he most loved, and now at the end of his career, in the darkest hour of his life, it is pleasant to know that recognition has come and that he has been chosen to serve in the direction where his ability is greatest, we trust for life, and we hope with complete success. The appointment of Mr. Estee gave yellow journalism an opportunity to attempt to breed discord among Republicans and to throw a little mud at Senator Perkins. It seems that Judge Green of Oakland is a "bad loser." Senator Perkins had promised to join the California delegation in supporting Judge Green for the appointment, and at the last session of Congress did endorse him for the place. But since that time things have happened that made it inexpedient for California to rest all of her claims to the Honolulu judgeship upon the fitness or ability of Judge Greene. Mr. Estee's name had been brought before the President for two offices, and his endorsements were such that it required an effort to disregard them. Indeed the President had broadly intimated that he would appoint Mr. Estee to the Philippine commission. Other influences prevailed, however, and Professor Moses was given the honor. It is not difficult to conceive why the President should now notify the leaders of the California delegation that this state might have the appointment of the Hawaiian judgeship if our representatives would agree upon Mr. Estee. There was something owing from the President to Mr. Estee which obligation the President was prepared to liquidate.

California was not entitled to the appointment as a matter of right, and if, rather than lose the place to the state, the delegation switched to the support of the only man in the state upon whom the President was inclined to bestow the favor, Senator Perkins certainly is not to blame. Judge Greene's evidence of displeasure is scarcely in good taste, and is more inclined to demean himself than to injure Senator Perkins. Judge Green is too good a man to be dragged into a controversy that will be likely to work him an injury among party men, and among the many friends of Senator Perkins throughout the state. The yellow branch of Democratic journalism was not slow to take advantage of Judge Greene's attitude for the purpose of stirring up party discord.

To prove Senator Perkins unworth, the Examiner published what purported to be a conversation between General Barnes and Irving M. Scott. Here is what the Examiner said:

"Then, during the long Senatorial dead-lock of a year ago last winter, General Barnes and Irving M. Scott were discussing their respective chances. Scott declared that Perkins was for him; Barnes insisted that he himself had the Senator's backing and favor. "Why, just read this letter from him," said Scott. Barnes took the letter, and read it over, whistled and exclaimed:

"Well, I'll be danged! Why, Scott, just read this," and he took a letter from his pocket and passed it over to the ship-builder. Scott read, whistled and exclaimed:

"Well, I'll be keel-hauled!"

Then the two statesmen stared at each other and began to cuss. In came Major McLaughlin and the situation was explained to him. "Why, Dan Burns has one of those letters too—Perkins is for him, first, last and all the time."

So they went out and rounded up the other candidates. Perkins was, according to his letters, heart and soul for every last one of them."

If Senator Perkins had been guilty of such contemptible duplicity, it would have entitled him to the contempt of all men. But now comes General Barnes, in a letter to the Examiner, in which he denies ever having held such a conversation with Mr. Scott, denies ever having received such a letter, and denies that Mr. Scott ever exhibited such a letter to him. Mr. Scott backs up this statement, denying absolutely that he received a letter from Senator Perkins promising his support, or that General Barnes had ever exhibited any such letter to him. It was a lie pure and simple.

Senator Perkins will probably admit the possession of his share of the faults that belong to man; but that he deliberately breaks his pledges, or promises support to more than one man for the same office is not believeable. The trouble is, that men seeking political appointments are too apt to jump at the conclusion that kindly treatment is equivalent to a promise of support. Courtesy to political aspirants has given rise to more charges of bad faith than has actual bad faith itself. The press and people of the state will not fail to recognize the wrong attempted on Senator Perkins.

Municipal Ownership Again.

OUT in Rutland, Vermont, their has been published a series of pamphlets comparing municipal with private ownerships, from one of which we make some extracts, because they fortify every stand we have taken on the subject. He says:

"Permitting a city to engage in speculative ventures or commercial industries, involves a most serious question, reversing the policy that has governed cities for hundreds of years, allowing them to assume all the hazards, risks and liabilities that attend the investment of money in business enterprises." That eminent author and jurist Judge Dillon says in this connection: "The legislature should be prohibited from allowing municpal corporations to engage in extra municipal projects or to incur debts or levy taxes for such purposes. To clothe them with powers to accomplish business which can better be left to private enterprise is unwise. Their chief function should be to regulate and govern."

We have declared the American municipalities to be unfit and unprepared for government ownership. Mr. Francisco quotes from Hon. Chas. Waring on this subject, who said "that he favored the purchase of street railways in Great Britain, but that in the United States it would be utterly out of the question on account of the attendant political evils."

Mr. Franicsco runs over a long list of municipal failures of municipal ownership. The losses shown run far up into the millions. City after city that embarked with enthusiasm into the new fad of public ownership have large debts left to prove the wisdom of the moralist's dream. Mr. Francisco says:

"When the advocates of municipal ownership find themselves unable to disprove the facts disclosed under municipal management in this country they invariably fall back upon Glasgow and the wonders achieved there by municipal ownership. The conditions are not the same in Glasgow as are found in the United States. The government is entirely different and the political situation that exists in this country is not found there. Wages are less than half those paid in this country. Conductors on street cars are paid 93 cents per day the first year and $1.04 the third year, while conductors on street cars in New York are paid $2.00 the first year and $2.25 after that. The average wages for railroad men in Glasgow are 78 cents per day, while in New York it is $1.88. Here we have a difference of more than 100 per cent in wages alone.

"Any one who has traveled over the street railroads in Glasgow knows perfectly well that the whole equipment and accommodations are antiquated and behind the age, while the service furnished there would not be tolerated in any city in the United States. We are also told that the profits of street railways in Glasgow pay all the expenses of the government. Instead of there being no taxes in Glasgow, they are more burdensome than in this country. Rents are taxed 12½ cents on every dollar that a man pays, and the owner of the property has to pay the same amount of tax, besides this license taxes are levied. You pay a tax for every servant employed, etc. etc. Mr. Robert Crawford of Glasgow, a strong advocate of the system in that city says: "Before I came to this country I saw no reason why American cities should not adopt municipal ownership and wondered why they had not done so. But now that I have obtained an insight into the conditions that prevail in your cities I have entirely changed my views. As things are now in your cities, municipal ownership is an impossibility. Success in that great undertaking is out of the question so long as party politics figures in municipal elections, and so long as city offices are used to reward political work."

Speaking of experiments in electric lighting Mr. Francisco says "The fact that a large number of cities after investing thousands of dollars and trying the system and finding it impossible to succeed have abandoned the business, is conclusive proof that the statements made by the advocates of municipal ownership as to the cost of lights are incorrect, for is it reasonable to suppose that if the lights only cost the amount these advocates claim, the system would not have been abandoned and a contract made with a private company at a higher price?" And then the author proceeds to quote a long list of cities that have abandoned their public lighting works "In every one of which cases" he says "thousands of dollars were lost." And here we got back to our original statement, that until a city has proven itself capable of attending to purely municipal business it should not be entrusted with new responsibilities. Adding new burdens will not increase the efficiency of an already inefficient government.

The party of Mr. Bryan—it is not the Democratic party has for months laid violent claims to the honor of being only simon-pure opponent of trusts engaged in the business of politics in America. Naturally enough, in as much as they could "holler louder" than the other fellow, an impression has been created among deaf men and damp-hools, that this is true.

A short time ago, the Republicans in Congress proposed a constitutional amendment that would place in the hands of Congress the power to regulate trusts. No one questions the efficacy of the plan proposed. It is conceded to cover every legal objection and is calculated to bring about the ends which Mr. Bryan's party claims as one of the chief purposes of its existence. Under ordinary circumstances one would imagine a bona fide opponent of the trust hastening to take quick advantage of this opportunity to "relieve the people." But not so with the Democrats in Congress. And their apathy in the matter gives rise to a pretty well justified suspicion that they are not opposed to trusts, for the purpose of benefitting the people, but only for the purpose of benefitting themselves. They oppose trusts to catch votes, not to kill monopoly. If the trusts could by any possibility be abolished before next election-time, Bryanism would stagger and grow sick under the blow. The Democrats in Congress caucused on the proposed trust measure and resolved to vote against it. "Because they didn't believe the Republicans were sincere in opposing trusts." This is the kind of statesmanship that belongs to the party of that "peerless statesman, who is the equal, if not the superior, of Clay and Webster." The Democratic position is this: "The Republicans will make votes if they are permitted to solve the trust problem. We will make votes if we kill off their measure and keep the trusts alive before the people." Of the two, the party that would make votes by giving relief, is preferable to the party that would kill off promised relief at the hands of an opponent.

COMMUNICATION.

In Defense of the Health Board.

IT would seem to all intelligent minds a self-evident necessity that a community sufficiently extensive and populous should have some person or persons, board or committee to look after the cleanliness and health. And when this board or committee (composed of competent and honorable men be it understood) is given being, then it becomes absolutely imperative on the part of this community or city to uphold the action of its committee or board to the last. Should influential property owners endeavor by injunction or otherwise, to hinder and retard this committee, then the highest tribunals should be invoked and the position of the property owner holding buildings, factories, or lands that menace the public health should be clearly and unmistakably defined. This granted, is San Francisco so upholding its Board of Health? Before answering that question I desire to express my opinion and protest against the ungenerous personal and almost brutal attitude taken up by the majority of the daily papers against this city's health board. I will, therefore, quickly run over the plague as we, the medical profession, know it. By so doing, the unprofessional may judge the justice of my contention. The plague is defined as an acute infective febrile disease accompanied by inflamation of the glands, hardly miasmatic (that is exhalations arising from the ground and floating in the atmosphere) partly communicable and caused by a micro-organism medically known "bacillus fiestes." The history of the plague is of great interest and an idea of its age is gained by a fragment from the writing of Rufus (100 A. D.). The classic Greek Aretæus speaks of it as the "Pestilential Bubo." The Great London plague in 1665 known as the black plague must now, without a shadow of a doubt, be considered a dreadfully malignant form of Bubonic Plague. Sudden development of the "Severe" out of the "Mild" has been alarmingly frequent in the history of this disease. Bombay in 1896 was stricken down in all its intensity by persons and things coming from Hong Kong. I pause here to emphatically demand the thorough appreciation of these two startling facts. Pathology brings another startling fact to the surface. The bacillus of the disease shows itself so imperfectly in its slain that the most expert bacteriologists, life-long students of the microscope and its tricks, hesitate in pronouncing it the true bacillus of the plague. This difficulty, bear well in mind, presents itself before the eyes of the bacteriologist in the quiet uninterrupted seclusion of his labratory. What then, can be expected, may I ask, when the study of these bacilli is made in an atmosphere of hurry and viturperation?

The channels of reception are respiratory, digestive and innoculative. Rats that eat infected food get the disease, and rats so infected showing all the symptoms, when intermingled with healthy mice, affect the latter, thus positively proving its contagion. The epidemic is produced by predisposing causes such as long dryness, famines, wars, and other conditions productive of lowered vitality. And almost hand in hand with the germ itself comes the condition of uncleanliness and filth accumulation.

Is Chinatown free from these conditions? Then presents itself the awful possibility of cadaveric infection. How do we know that Chinamen are not burying their dead in our midst? With these absolute truths confronting us, is it not unjust, yes, almost criminally unjust, to in any way hamper, hinder, or trammel the action of a board of health composed of reputable and scientific gentlemen in their strenuous endeavor to protect and further the public. Personal and political enmity to these gentlemen, no matter how high or influential its fountain-head, should have no weight whatsoever in handicapping their conscientious effort, even should their care and diligence err in being too extensive and searching. Oh, the stupidity of it all! Can the San Francisco policeman quarantine the fly and the rat? Poor Medical Board, I pity you, for as sure as death, should this disease light up elsewhere, the very papers that have damned your care will damn your carelessness.

Scenes in Santiago, Capital of the Republic of Chile.

The Capital of the "Lone Star" Republic.

WHEN you have reached Chile, people are wont to tell you that you are at "the jumping off place of the world." That may be all true as far as distance is concerned, but if any one expects to land on the shores of the republic and find himself surrounded by all the discomforts of a foreign frontier he is doomed to discover that he is in error. If you are coming up from Valparaiso, you may purchase your seat hours in advance in a well kept Pullman car and en route you will stop for refreshments at a station where you will find a much better meal than many of our best North American railways furnish. Outside the station you may purchase a basket of delicious fruit for which, if you are not wise, the clever salewoman will make you pay three times the price. Even then, when you come to investigate its contents you will find the basket more than half full of the best straw which Chili produces, topped by a beautiful layer of fruit. The liberal handed "Gringo" is a splendid mark for all such little financial pleasantries on the part of the native, so that it not only behooves the newcomer to move with care in both great and small investments, but to instill into his mind that even though he is among people who do not patter "English as she is spoke" they are nevertheless filled with the highest quality of intelligence. Unfortunately, many of them do not devote this keenness to the acquiring of wealth by the methods dictated to Moses on those tablets of stone.

Well, you have eaten a splendid luncheon at Llai Llai, have been hoodwinked by a dark-eyed senorita fruit vender and now the train is climbing up the steep grades on the western slope of the lower Cordillera. It is not at all unlike some of the grades which cross our own chains of mountains, and as the train winds in and out among the rocks and dashes through the tunnels one looks back over a beautifully fertile valley covered with vineyards and watered by irrigation ditches from the mountains over which we are now passing. We are passing over a first-class piece of railway engineering, and once at the summit we slide down into the plain of which Santiago occupies the center, having made the run from tide water in splendid time and with a great degree of comfort. We are disembarked at Santiago in an immense and splendidly constructed railway station and have the choice of several hotels, at any of which one can secure not alone comfort but a reasonable amount of luxury.

As you move to the hosteltry of your choice, you are driven through the principal avenue of the city, known as the Alameda or as properly christened the Aveneda de las Delicias. Barring the bad quality of its paving, this avenue is really a grand feature of the city. The Alameda possesses two magnificent drives, each bordered on the inner side by a thickly set line of fine trees, while between the trees and in the center of the way runs a broad and well kept walk broken here and there by a monumental statue or memorial to some individual who has in times past done much for the republic. By far the most striking of these is a colossal equestrian statue of Bernardo O'Higgins. As this famous Chilino is far better known abroad as a naval leader than for any exploits on shore, it is something of a surprise to see him immortalized on the back of a dashing charger, but the explanation comes easily when you are told that not only was O'Higgins a leader of men at sea but that he also distinguished himself by leading Chile's land forces in some of the most desperate battles which the republic has known.

Along the Alameda are scattered some of the finest dwellings of the city, these palaces rubbing elbows with habitations half given over to the vending of small wares or tumbling in a condition nearly approaching ruin. These handsomer residences possess no special characteristics, few of them being other than immense "casas" to which have been added facades designed by French or Italian architects. Nearly all of these palaces possess the antique "patio" with its surrounding apartments and few of them have any heating conveniences, the people preferring to fend off the cold by enduring it until the sun comes back to warm them. Not that fires are a grave necessity in this climate, but there are still many days when the sparkle of a cheerful blaze would add to creature comfort.

One of the features of life in this Chilean capital are the evenings on the "Plaza de Armis." Everyone dines late and feels it a duty to spend a few moments on this little square shortly after the meal is finished. No matter in which direction a gentleman's road may lead, whether to the club, the theatre or toward the first of a series of calling-places, he must make a course which will allow of a few turns around the plaza where he will meet everyone of importance and more than likely doff his hat to the very people with whom in half an hour he has an appointment in another portion of the ci y. This plaza is really an enticing place, with its well-kept walks and lawns, its four sides being faced with the cathedral and Archbishop's palace, the municipal buildings, the "Hotel de France" and the "Bazar Espanol." When from the music stand a really good military band is rendering popular music this diminutive brilliantly lighted park becomes an attractive spot, especially when its throng is enlivened by the elaborate toilettes of the Chileno belles and the heavy, bullioned uniforms of Chile's army officers.

Santiago is noted for its fine private equipages, it being estimated that no city in the world of equal population can boast of more or better private turn-outs than the Chilean capital. All these are of European manufacture and it is the special endeavor of each owner to display its grandeur on every possible occasion. The principal drive is to the Parque Cousino, a well laid out but not thoroughly developed recreation ground at the southern portion of the city. At one place the Parque is given over to a circular drive which closely resembles a modern race course. On the afternoons when driving is thoroughly "the thing" all of fashionable Santiago may be found upon this circle, the carriages travelling around the oval in bunches four and five abreast. It does not seem that these people gather here for the joy of it, for never was conclave more solemn or austere. Slowly the glittering cavalcade will move around the center, their occupants exchanging greetings with the utmost solemnity. Suddenly there will be an unheard yet understood signal, for in an instant will begin a wild dash which would put to blush even the chariot races of ancient Rome. Out through the park entrance the chase leads into the Calle Diezy Ocho, the vehicles fairly jambing this well paved thoroughfare from curb to curb. The wild drive increases in speed until it seems as if half the carriages would be dashed asunder. On they go, until the Alameda is reached, each of the six squares being traversed in time faster than the last, but once upon the broader avenue decorum again takes possession of the wild drivers and the solemn procession which but a short time ago graced the park is reformed on the Alameda and takes up its slow movement up one side and down the other of this broad highway. It is an odd custom and one for which no one offers or attempts to discover an explanation. It exists, it is a part and parcel of Santiago's fashionable life, and that is the end of it.

But a block removed from the "Plaza de Armis" is the "Congreso National" or Capitol building of the republic. This edifice stands in a well kept square and is built upon the site of what was Santiago's most beautiful house of worship. This church was destroyed by fire in 1863 and several hundred people, nearly all women, lost their lives in the conflagration. This reminds me that in Chile as well as in most of the South American Republics the church-going is done almost exclusively by women. It is a sincere kind of church-going, too. There is no such thing as the Easter bonnet and none of that yearning for church toilettes common to the less devout nations of the earth. To church the lady goes shrouded in the deepest black. Not a touch of color or aught by which one may be distinguished from another. Hooded in the characteristic "manta" they plod to and from their devotions with the regularity of clock-work. But of the "manta" there is another story. Generations have taught these dark-eyed beauties how best its folds may be arranged to show off their charms of feature and I am not sure but that many of our own American women would look much better with face framed in this artistically draped setting of the Chilinas than in those wonderful confections from across the seas. At any rate I saw signoras a plenty while I was in Chile, their heads covered with pesos upon pesos worth of French millinery, but not a one of these seemed to compare with the faces wrapped in the "manta" and en route to mass or vespers. In proof that I am more than half right, most of the Anglo-Saxon ladies who come to these republics make haste to adopt the "manta," wearing it on every occasion where it may be considered proper to do so.

Santiago's shopping places are many. Nearly all the goods on sale are of European manufacture, the business-like Englishman and the trade-seeking German having seized the greater portion of the Chilean import traffic. Everything is measured by the metric system and to call for anything measured in feet, inches or yards is a puzzler to the Chilean shop keeper.

While the naval headquarters of the republic are at Valparaiso, the army centers at Santiago. Here is the institution for military education, this, and the army proper, being under the tutelage of German officers. The body of cadets which Chile is educating for her army officers are quartered in barracks in the suburbs of Santiago and are a specially fine body of youngsters. The army itself shows diligent training and for its size is the equal of any fighting force in the world. Both in army and naval affairs Chile is fully up to the times in the art of war, having evidently taken precedent over everything else in this narrow strip of South America.

One of the peculiar features of this as well as all the cities of Chile are the lady street car conductors. It seems that during the wars, which within the last generation called forth all the fighting force which the republic could muster, men became very scarce and the Chilean women learned to do their work. Men returned to take their places in the other fields of industry, but women kept their hold on the street cars; today, the coins are collected and the fares rung up by senoritas on every tram road in the republic. I am told by railroad managers that the system is successful, the women being found to be much more honest than their male predecessors, the difference in revenues being manifest from the inception of the system.

Club life there is in Santiago, and plenty of it. Not the club life of the states, for there is none of the home-like features of comfort which distiuguish our organizations. Nevertheless the Santiago clubs are pleasant places where you will meet the best of the capital's business and professional men. The leading club is the "Circulo del Union" which has a membership of nearly one thousand. The Union occupies a roomy building on the Calle Bandera, to which an elaborate addition in the shape of banquet halls and cafe is now in course of construction.

Chilenos love amusement and the capital possesses one magnificent opera house where in season the wealth and beauty of Santiago listen to French or Italian opera. Besides, there are several minor play-houses, the most important of these being built on the heights of the "Cerro Santa Lucia," a rocky mount in the center of the city which has been transformed into a beautiful pleasure ground. Round about the city and within easy driving distance lie some of those grand estates which have rendered Chile famous.

In this far away corner of the earth there is much to be developed by a study of this effervescent people who, tracing their lineage to nearly every nation of Europe, still maintain the language and principal characteristics of the national mother, Spain, whose yoke the republic threw off nearly a century ago.

DOUGLAS WHITE.

FORM IN AUTOMOBILES.

Why Horseless Carriages Stick to the Old Form of Models.

THE automobile, being now in its infancy, still sticks to the old horse tradition in its shape and appearance. As "horseless carriages" they were conceived and planned, and the appearance of one of these vehicles is still that of a carriage whose horses have run away.

Even a peddler's wagon has more harmony of line and shape in its design. The automobile of to-day is nothing more than a buggy or carriage box with the horses removed and a gasoline or electrical mechanism placed underneath. Sprin gs project in front, the old dashboard style is retained, and but little effort has so far been made by the builders to provide a distinct automobile design which shall contain in its appearance no suggestion of the absence of the horse. The result is that there goes careening through the streets as homely and inartistic a class of vehicles as any community was ever called to look upon.

As a matter of history, builders of the first railroad coaches were as slow in changing the first patterns of their cars as automobile manufacturers are now. The old Harlem and Hudson Railway coach was nothing more than the box of a stagecoach lifted from wagon wheels to car wheels. Even the postillion's seat in the rear and the driver's seat in front were retained and both occupied by passengers who preferred to ride outside. The four windows of a stagecoach were also retained, and when the coaches passed along the way pulled by a locomotive the thought was, as now with the automobile "Where are the horses?" The stagecoach style of railroad coach prevailed from the time of the first construction of a railroad in this country until after 1850. The West was the first to distinctly break away from the style. The old Galena and Chicago Union Road adopted the square box car with diminutive platform at each end. But the ornamental, highly finished railroad coach of to-day did not become an accomplished fact until long after George M. Pullman built his first sleeping car. The modern passenger car, while in a sense an evolution from the stagecoach, was finally designed and accepted by all the railroad companies without any reference to the ancient plans on which road coaches were made.

The automobile has been passing through its infancy, and there have been a hundred important matters to settle before design of box could be considered. It has been easier and cheaper to simply use the old style carriage box. Inventors and manufacturers have had to bother their brains over the style of the motor, capacity, the vibrations, durability, weight, power, speed and kindred subjects. For example, when the automobile first came out in this country people complained that its noise was too much like the noise made by other vehicles. They could not distinguish its approach, and hence were not warned of approaching danger. As a result a new kind of noise had to be devised, one that would give warning. That was more important than a new box design.

Next come the discussion of the relative merits of steam, gasoline and electricity. That is settled now, it being proved that each has its own accepted place. The questions of speed, safety and control are adjusting themselves, and shape will be the next consideration. A Chicago firm has been experimenting in that direction, by doing away with the dashboard, the ugliest feature of the old horseless carriage, substituting therefor a sort of peak or prow, which comes to a point in front and has some additionul use as a wind-break on the principle of the cigar-shaped train. Still another firm is for lowering the driver's seat. In the old horse carriage, a commanding position was necessary; machinery may be commanded from any position. These are only slight changes, but they indicate the general trend; the time is near at hand when the automobile will be no nearer in appearance to the horse-drawn carriage than the Pullman sleeper to the stage-coach. But the change will be gradual, a progression from stage to stage.

At Fresno it has been demonstrated that the blastophaga wasp, which is necessary to the maturing of Smyrna figs, will thrive in this climate. The wasps imported from Smyrna last fall were placed on wild or capic fig trees in glass shelter, and on the first of this month they emerged from the wild figs. As the Smyrna figs were not ready for them, the wasps took refuge in a second crop of the wild fig trees. It is believed now that they will emerge again and fertilize the Smyrna figs. If the experiment proves successful, it will mean that California can produce the white flag of commerce as well as Asia Minor, and it will introduce a new and very profitable industry.

Sunday, April 1, the University of Chicago woke up over $4,000,000 richer than she was on the morning before. The time limit imposed by Mr. Rockefeller for his $2,000,000 gift expired the day before. On Saturday morning the university was short $163,000 of the $2,000,000 which it was necessary to raise to secure the prize. Within two hours' hustling President Harper had not only raised the required sum, but considerably more.

UP THE TANANA.

Voyage of a Party of Miners up an Unknown Alaskan River.

Working on the Sluice.

A Winter Camp.

A Typical Spring Landscape.

TO a party of seventeen gold-seekers belongs the distinction of being the first white men to ascend the largest of the tributaries of the Yukon river—the Tanana, which joins the greater stream at Weare, a trading post about 950 miles from its mouth. The trip was made during August and September, 1898, and demonstrated the practicability of navigating the Tanana for a distance of upwards of 300 miles, with light-draft steamboats—a fact which had until then been unproven, and held much in doubt.

The party comprised two companies of prospectors, each in its own steamer, the smaller boat, named the Potlatch, carrying five men, and the Tanana Chief having on board a company of twelve. Both vessels were stern-wheel, flat-bottomed river-boats, built expressly for the journey; the Potlatch, of ten tons capacity, at Racine, Wisconsin, and shipped to Seattle on a flat car, and the Chief, of thirty-five tons, set up at Stillwater, Minnesota, and transported in a knocked-down condition to tide-water. At Unalaska, where a delay of some weeks was experienced owing to the ice in the northern waters at the time of arrival there, the Chief was put together, and made the trip acrosst he Behring Sea at the end of a tow-line from the ocean steamer which carried her owners; and both the little boast were completed on the flats just inside the Aphoon mouth of the Yukon. From here they started under their own steam, July 25, reaching Weare just a month later, the strong, swift current and the muddy condition of the water which interfered greatly with the working of the boilers, making progress up the Yukon a matter of slow accomplishment.

At the point of its confluence with the Yukon, the Tanana is as broad as its more famous neighbor, and appears to the eye to carry as great a flood, but it is shallow, and full of ever-shifting sand bars, both here and above, so that even the most experienced pilot could not learn and safely keep to an invariable course. Constant "reading" of the water from the wheel-house was necessary, and most of the time continual sounding by means of poles, to keep the boats from getting aground in midstream. Just above where the current sets into the main stream, the channel is particularly tortuous and confusing, and an examination of the ground was made in a rowboat before venturing with the steamers. Early in the journey the Potlatch's engines had proven unequal to the task of keeping pace with her stronger convoy; and so that the men on board each might have the other's help and company, the two vessels were lashed together side by side. Each boat pushed in front of it a square-toed barge filled with provisions and mining equipage; and in this order the flotilla made its way up the stream.

With the start from the little settlemen at Weare, the last vestige of civilization was THINGS AND PEOPLE.

W. R. Hearst's Place in Journalism.

I SEE that W. R. Hearst is to start an evening paper in Chicago. The time has gone by when one can afford to cavil at Mr. Hearst's ability as a newspaper promoter or his place in journalism. Nothing but the very genius of newspaper management could have produced his tremendous success in his chosen field. We all know the Examiner Journal. We laugh at it, rail against it, oppose it, but the public reads it. To-day, the Examiner has the greatest circulation on the Pacific Coast, the Morning Journal the greatest in New York and the Evening Journal a greater circulation than all the other New York evening papers combined. The intelligent, educated and refined class of newspaper readers do not take these papers. In New York, recently, I watched the intelligent business and professional men on their way to and from their offices on the Elevated. They were reading the Times, the Sun, the Herald—hardly one of them held the Journal. This tremendous circulation, then, comes from the mass of the people, not the upper or governing classes. Mr. Hearst works on the principle that the poor man or the man in moderate circumstances pays as much for his paper as the rich man or the educated one. And with that remarkable journalistic insight which alone explains his success, he has found what this class wants and is giving it to them. In short, he has learned how to reach the greatest number of the American people. Therein lies the success which is measured by the fact that the International Paper Company furnisher twice as much paper stock for Hearst as for any other one paper publisher in the country.

What is the policy by which the Examiner-Journal combination captures the greatest number of subscribers in the country? Reduced to its lowest terms, it consists in presenting the greatest amount of action to the smallest amount of intellect. Consider the tastes of the clientele for which it is playing. Their ideal of fiction is the sensational story, their ideal of the drama, melodrama and vaudeville. The Examiner-Journal is the vaudeville of journalism. There is always "something doing," something new, something loud and assertive in its pages. It is giving somebody a picnic, relieving somebody's distress, sending somebody to a convention across the continent, outlining and urging some huge, lurid, far-reaching national policy. Troubled by no scruples, it invariably manages to attract the greatest amount of attention, to seem in the lead in everything. This appeals to the American vulgarian. If anyone thinks it is easy to do this sort of thing, let him try it—and fail. It is all very well to laugh at Hearst, to call him brainless and a dude; he is far from brainless, for chance alone would never have established his double and triple successes. And there is hope that, having established place, prestige and circulation, the Hearst combination of dailies may tone down considerably. I, for one, have not forgotten that a generation ago James Gordon Bennett and the Herald were regarded as a dangerous and blackguardly combination, yet now the Herald has leading place in New York. I shall be very much surprised if Hearst does not succeed in Chicago, which, among all American cities, has the greatest percentage of the sort of people to whom it is Hearst's policy to minister.

Journalism or Crime?

THE question "How far is newspaper work compatible with a Puritan conscience?" is revived by the publication, in a late issue of the Philadelphia Saturday Evening Post of a paper in the series "Great Newspaper Feats." In it, a representative of a great Chicago paper tells in the first person and with journalistic pride, how he secured for his journal a copy of the revised version of the New Testament in advance of its general publication in 1881. The most elaborate safeguards had been employed in order to prevent premature publication of this book. The journalist in question crossed the ocean twice, passed himself off as several different sorts of person, twice attempted to steal the book and failed, and finally secured it by a mixture of lying, bribery and betrayed confidence. Few of the ten commandments were spared in his two weeks' active work on behalf of his "scoop." The final consummation of the scheme cost the rightful owners of the Revised Version a pretty sum of money; yet he tells it all in cold blood and with the most evident pride. He calls it, and the publishers of the Post call it, "enterprise." To an outsider, not blessed with a newspaper conscience, it looks sadly like crime. It is undoubtedly true that deceit and questionable method which escapes the law is at the bottom of many and many a successful career outside of journalism; only, we do not find the perpetrators thereof bragging about it in print. A lawyer or a statesman who builds upon such a foundation keeps mightily still about it. Only in the newspaper business is this tolerated. It is the logical result of the false ideas of journalism fostered and encouraged by the yellow press. Enterprise is the god of adoration to the sensational papers. Anything, anything, to prove and advertise the enterprise of the "sheet," is the firmest principle in this class of newspaper. Truth, honesty and fair dealing are as nothing beside it.

A Juggled Argument.

THE fallacy of the average partizan argument is proved by a recent "spiel" made by a rabid teetotaler physician in England. He called scientific methods his aid, taking a squad of laborers on the public highways as his subjects. To one division of the squad he administered a "dram" at two-hour intervals during the day; the other worked thirsty. At the end of a week, the prohibition division had accomplished much more work than the thirsty division. Hence, he puts it down as a proved fact that indulgence in alcohol is weakening, and lowers efficiency, both physicial and mental. This illustrates beautifully the value of half truths. I am going to do some experimenting on my own account. I am going to take a gang of laborers and break it into two divisions. To the one, I am going to give the ordinary "three squares" a day; the other is to be fed a large, full meal every two hours. At the end of a week, the eating squadron, which has been rendered lazy by working on a full stomach, will, I have no doubt, be rods behind the other. Therefore, eating is a bad thing, food is a harmful indulgence to be avoided. The proof is as good in one case as in the other. Alcoholic stimulants sre not supposed to further physical efficiency at the time when they are administered. If they did, athletes would do their work on doses of whiskey. Anyone who has ever coquetted with "the demon rum" knows that. But no more does a full meal further physical efficiency at the very time when it is taken, and no more would an athlete attempt a feat of strength or speed after taking a big dinner. If alcohol is of benefit, its use lies in its effect upon the system when it is resting and relaxed, not when it is strained and at tension. Yet, I have no doubt that the specious and false "proof" of the English fanatic will make an appeal to the half-minded and prejudiced. It is an old system. Hence the Bryanite party.

Half-truths are often being used in the same cause by our Methodist brethren in the fight against the army canteen system, which occupied most of their late General Conference. Everyone knows that the soldier in the ranks, being "a single man in barracks" and without ties, is prone to indulge in strong waters. The army canteen is an institution wherein the soldier gets the milder forms of alcoholic beverages under conditions whereby he may be controlled, and his tendency toward drunkenness may be regulated. Princeton University which, among all the colleges in the country has the most enlightened method of regulating its student affairs, supports an institution of like purpose, which is situated on the campus and owned by the University. That the army canteen has worked well, is the testimony of every unprejudiced army officer. One need only have studied the Eighth Army Corps' experience in San Francisco to be convinced that a certain amount of drinking is inseparable from army life. When the big volunteer army was resting at Camp Merritt, there was no canteen; the hurry and excitement of the times prevent attention to that detail. Within a month, there sprang up on the borders of the camp a town of drinking-places, most of them of low character and all noisy and riotous, the scenes of unmeasured drunkenness and violence. The soldier would drink; having no place in which he could drink like a gentleman, he went to places where he was forced to drink like a rowdy. Just as soon as our Methodist friends can show that the abolition of the canteen would put an end to all drinking in the army, just so soon will they have a right to ask for the abolition of the canteen. Until that time, common sense would counsel that they choose the least of two things which they are pleased to consider as evils.

BOSWELL, JR.

THE SEATTLE-NOME FLEET.

See Pages 8 and 9.

ALL winter, Seattle has been preparing for the Cape Nome rush. Since the ice closed last fall, the "floating population" men wintering in the city while waiting to take steamer for the North, have made a strange and interesting element in the city. It became the town's chief interest. The ordinary industries, the new spread of Oriental commerce were as nothing to the glittering possibilities of the North. But when the season finally broke and the Gen. McPherson, first of the fleet, got away for the North, the croakers said that the Nome rush had been overestimated, that the traders and speculators were destined to "go broke" on the outcome, and that the whole thing had been overestimated. Indeed, it seemed so at the time. Possibly because most of the voyagers were afraid to risk their lives and most of the traders hesitated to venture their freight on the uncertain early passage. Cape Nome transportation seemed slow and sluggish in the fortnight after April 15.

Six weeks have passed since then, and the prophets of a big Nome rush are justified, while the croakers are silenced. More than fifty vessels had gone out under sail and steam up to May 27, carrying exactly 7,924 passengers and 33,672 tons of freight. The most sanguine never estimated the summer rush higher than ten thousand. Yet it has passed the eight thousand mark by the first of June, and still continues. An aggregate greatly over ten thousand is almost a certainty. The business houses carrying goods of the class needed at Cape Nome have been rushed to the limit of their capacity. Dealers in machinery and supplies laid in a large stock of goods during the winter in anticipation of a great demand, but they almost invariably underestimated. Knowing that Seattle dealers have made a special study of conditions in the North, a great majority of the "outlander" gold seekers prepared to purchase their outfits there rather than at home. This undetermined factor played ducks and drakes with business calculations. The wires from Seattle have been kept hot with telegrams for new stock, new orders; many dealers "sold out and quit"—temporarily—owing to the utter impossibility of getting additional goods out in time. The machinery and supply houses have made small fortunes; those who had the foresight to invest in such enterprises last fall have done better than the holders of most Cape Nome claims.

The days on which a Nome fleet was scheduled to sale have been like holidays in Seattle. Whosoever had no business or was temporarily disengaged, crowded to the wharves and docks to witness the departure of the gold-seekers. It was a noticeable fact that there was less tension and real excitement than in the old, burning days of the first Klondike rush. Then Alaska was a land of unknown terrors; now, the terrors are still known to be there, but the dangers are better understood, and therefore seem less potent to the gold-seeker and the girl he leaves behind him. It is the unknown danger which apalls. In this case, the danger has been much lessened by intelligent study of conditions; it is noticeable that nineteen out of twenty men who went North on this rush were thoroughly well provided and prepared and carried little that was superfluous. The Klondike was largely adventure; Nome is business.

UP THE TANANA.

left behind, the waterway up the Tanana being through an unbroken virgin wilderness varied only by the changes in landscape incidental to a comparatively flat count mostly covered with forest, with here and there a stretch of country, a low bluff with face of sharp broken rock, a clay bank, and willows and alders bordering the stream and trailing their green branches in its swift waters throughout almost the entire distance. The native population is sparse and widely scattered; the Indian villages on the Tanana are few, and each consists of but a small collection of log huts. In the summer season these are mostly deserted for the camps located at the most favorable points for catching the salmon which form so large a part of the Indian's diet. Here the natives live in tents or tepees, and the bright orange red of the fish drying in the sunshine catches the eye at the first approach to the camp, standing out in patches of strong color against the green and brown of the trees and the soil.

The Indians of that region are a friendly people, always good-natured, and cheerful even under conditions of existence which to most whites would appear very disheartening. They have no tribal name, but call themselves simply "the people," and each little group of families designates those outside itself and its own immediate neighborhood by words which in their language signify the "up-river people," the "over-there people," and so forth,—names generally having reference only to locality. They have all come more or less under the influence of the missionary, and are nearly all, as one of them expressed it, "Jesus Christ men." Most of them have received in baptism Christian names, taken largely from the Bible, and have dropped their old Indian names. Peter, Andrew, Simon, John, Abraham, Joseph and other worthies of the Old and New Testaments have many namesakes among the Indian of the Tanana.

Bates Rapids, whose lower end is met about 300 miles from the mouth of the Tanana, and which extend for nearly eighty miles along that river, form an apparently impassable barrier to the farther progress of steamers. Shortly before reaching this point, the prospectors on the Tanana Chief and Potlatch had turned off the main river into a smaller stream called by the natives the Chena, which comes in on the right bank, its general course being from the east, dipping slightly to the southwest. The banks of the Tanana, like many parts of the Yukon abound in sloughs which make it difficult to tell which is the main channel, and the voyagers were helped in finding their into the Chena by an Indian who came aboard at Satswskiholan, one of the two principal villages on the Tanana, the other being Fortilla, further down, at the mouth of the Cantwell or Neenana river.

The Chena, quite a wide stream at its junction with the Tanana, rapidly lessens in size as it is ascended, and is very crooked, with a swift current against at many places it is hard to make headway even with steam-power. Warping up by means of ropes carried ashore was sometimes the only way of getting past swift gorges, around sharp turns or out of swirling eddies. The difficulties of the journey were greatly increased, also, by the fallen logs which lie in the water pointing downstream, threatening to pierce the boats' hulls; and the leaning trees which overhang the river raked the vessels from stem to stern, smashed the cabin windows and often seemed likely to sweep overboard everything that was not fastened down.

The waters of the China are clear as crystal, in marked contrast to the turbid floods of the Tanana and the Yukon; but the machinery of the Potlatch having become useless through the wearing out of her injectors while in the lower river, after several days of slow, hard pushing up the China she was run into a slough and dismantled; her crew and stores were taken aboard the Tanana Chief, and some 30 miles farther on the diminished size of the stream brought the water journey to an end.

Here winter camp was established and two comfortable cabins were built. The barges were hauled up on the bank and placed on posts and utilized as caches for provisions; and the place was named Fort Chena. Here arrived, on October 4, Lieut. Joseph C. Castner of the U. S. army exploring expedition. His story is among the most exciting of the tales of adventure in the history of that northern land. Parting from the commander of the expedition Capt. E. F. Glenn, at Camp Separation, he had traveled northward with two soldier comrades, had met with disaster in the upsetting of his raft in the river, by which all his supplies, instruments, papers and tools, even his ax and rifle, were lost, so that they were left with nothing but the clothes they stood in, and were obliged to push on as best they could to save their lives. They heard from Indians that a steamboat with white men had come up the Chena and the friendly natives guided him to the camp. When Lieut. Castner arrived at Fort Chena he and his companions had for two weeks had nothing to eat but the wild berries they could find in the woods, and their strength and endurance were well-nigh exhausted. He was furnished with the necessary supplies and clothing and a large yawl-boat in which he made his way safely to Weare.

From Fort Chena progress to the headwaters of the Chena was made by packing on the trail and after winter set in by sledding on the river. Seven small log-cabins were built nine or ten miles apart, as shelter houses, along the river and four men, two from each company, proceeded at once into the hills and sunk prospect-holes, while the rest brought up the goods.

By early spring all were at work on Wolverene Gulch which heads in the Tanana Hills across the divide from Birch Creek, about 100 miles south of Circle. In this vicinity several months were spent in prospecting various gulches, but without finding gold in paying quantities. Eight of the Tanana men descended he river about June 1 to Weare where the Chief was purchased by the storekeeper and put into service in connection with the work incidental to the establishment of the military post of Fort Gibbon at that point. Later others descended in an open flat boat some returning to the States and some going to Dawson and still others went across country to Circle. The party on the Potlatch was led by Fred J. Currier of River Falls Wisconsin, a former employe of Capt. Healey and experienced gold-miner, the other members of the company being Edward Conrad of Hammond, Wisconsin, and Thomas W. Brown, Oliver G. Torrance and Charles H. J. Bliss of Minneapolis, Minnesota. The Tanana mining company comprised E. M. Wells, Sydney A. Warner, Joseph W. Morgan, Theodore L. Morgan and James E. Orme of St. Paul; Dr. Harry Fowler of Minneapolis; Frank L. Gibbs, Anton Olson and S. C. Sargent of Taylor's Falls, Wisconsin; H. C. Sperbeck of New Richmond, Wisconsin; Wilson Barlow of New York and Thomas Rowlands of Belleville, Ontario. While the pecuniary results of the expedition were insignificant, it is of interest as marking the first entrance of steamers into a region which may yet have some rich surprises in store for the persevering prospector.

PE NOME STEAMERS FROM SEATTLE.

Meditations of a Matron.

I AM back to you once more, my dear Diary. It is nice to return to one's adoring family especially the Father. Curious, none of my people ever really appreciate me until I went off and got married. I do not feel changed at all. I am certainly not in the least more dignified. I have not yet had a misunderstanding with the ideal. He is, mama says, a most exacting husband. I have, however, not noticed that side of him yet. It is so fine to be married. I have, already, Diary dear, been chaperon twelve times. That is wherein lies the snap of being married. It was always so hard to get a chaperon that all the fellows and girls would like. I suppose you want to know how I took in other places. I think I must have been a success, for I received a terrific amount of attention. I can count my friends now all over the States. You see I am accustomed to entertain and be entertained. It is a gift, perhaps, but one that may easily be cultivated. I cultivated it with papa and found it gradually grew with my growth and strengthened with my strength, and now it is part of my very being. We went all over New York State and I went out until I thought I needed new clothes. Then we sent out postal cards and I have come home with an entirely new wardrobe, and the most wonderful maid in the world. She is a Portuguese, and the prettiest, neatest person one could wish to see, and so clever with her fingers. I do not now see how any girl can get on without a maid. Yet mama, Leila and I managed with one between us for years—of course, she is Mama's. Whatever she did for me was from love in the evening.

We spent a good while in Philadelphia. The Ideal's people all live there. They, of course, are direct descendants of William Penn. That did not interest me a bit. You see I have been brought upon all the different people, of whom I am a direct descendant, and it has been such a bore living up or down to these tiresome ancestors of Mama's. I guess Papa had none. I have never heard him speak of them. Ancestors is the one of many topics the Ideal and I have decided to bar from our conversations. I really find him the most aimable and generous man I have ever met. It is sometimes embarassing to be married to an overgenerous man. He persisted in showering all sorts of beautiful presents of every kind upon me. I, of course, could not reciprocate, and not being a person who can take everything and give nothing, I determined to do my part too. I went to Howard's on Fifth Avenue, and explained to one of the members of the firm my position. Then I brought forth a diamond sunburst that Papa gave me for a wedding present. The firm was quite willing to give me credit for it, so I bought a present of considerable value for the Ideal. Papa sent on for the sunburst as soon as I told him my tale of woe. Papa is the second nicest man I know. You see I am terribly in love. It is a fine feeling to have, too. I do trust it will last. Mama discourages it quite strongly. I wonder Papa is half as agreeable a man as he is. As for Leila, I really think mama has spoiled her girlhood. But I must not discuss my family affairs even with you, Diary dear.

Ever since our return we have been spending a day or so at each of the resorts to see at which we shall stay. The Vendome's table is the best. We got the best squabs I have ever tasted one night at dinner there. It is so well managed, and the Santa Clara Valley is full of the most wonderful drives. I hope we shall spend some time down there. Then we tried San Rafael. I want a cottage there so much. It is hard to get one; we, you see, are rather late. The Winslows, LeFevres, Eugene Lents, Bob Hookers, and Walter Deans, Thomas, Boardmans, and Sydney Smiths all are most comfortabiy ensconced in houses. There will be lots of entertaining going on, as the season in San Rafael will be pretty gay. The links over there are fine. Mrs. Crooks is playing a pretty good game now, so are Mrs. Green and Mrs. Johnstone. The Ideal has the Golf fever, so we may yet end at the Hotel Rafael. We have been invited down to the Hopkins in Menlo Park to spend the week end. I like to go there, it is so nice to wander about, their beautiful grounds. The Josselyns are giving house parties, so are the Prestons. That sort of thing is what makes owning a country place really worth while.

I was surprised to hear of Leila Voorhies marrying so soon. Elizabeth Huntington is to be her maid of honor, and instead of having bridesmaids she is to have her best girl friends to sit at her table. I am sorry it is not a church wedding. I like to look back on Helen Thomas, Bessie Shreve's and my own wedding. They were beautiful affairs, so were Bertha Welsh Russel's and Emily Hager's. Leila Voorhies I am sure will make a lovely bride. Miss Snider and Johnny Merril are also to be married this month. Leila likes Miss Snider very much indeed, says she is a fine girl. That is high praise from Leila for she is so censorious. I see that Naval Constructor T. Gaines Roberts has announced his engagement to Miss Trowbridge of Brooklyn. I hear she will be quite an acquisition to Mare Island, being a most charming girl. Alice Moffatt and Mr. Doubleday are to be married in Oakland in the near future. I am sorry Alice is to live in the East. She is such a jolly, bright, enthusiastic girl it seems too bad we must lose her. I was so sorry not to have been able to remain in New York until after Mary Crocker's wedding. I should like to see a beautitul Eastern wedding. Mary Scott is to be maid of honor. Jennie Crocker, Caro Crockett, Harriet Alexander, Susie McCook, and Whitelaw Reid's daughter are to be bridesmaids. All the girls with the exception of Mr. Alexander's niece, Susie McCook, are half Californians. Susie is a nice girl, she spent six weeks out here last summer, and I became quite fond of her. She has such beautiful rich coloring. Mary Crocker's veil is very beautiful, her gown ivory satin. Her trousseau is elaborate, but in excellent taste. Mary is an exceedingly well balanced girl and not foolishly extravagant. She has very good taste and fortunately the means to gratify it.

Poor, dear Diary I think I have told you all the news of this week. I have not been home long enough yet to go down to Del Monte, but how I long to get amidst the beautiful trees and flowers. There is no place like it on the rest of this Continent. It will be as usually very gay this year, as the jolliest people in San Francisco intend going there. As mama always says, one is sure at Del Monte to meet as many charming Eastern people as San Franciscans and that in itself is a great pleasure. I do not think I have any more to tell you at present but hope to have lots of gossip all this Summer.

Good bye, Diary dear, I am glad to be back to you all once more.

MRS. CRICKET.

Miss Ethel Clendenning Trowbridge, who will be married to Assistant Naval Constructor T. G. Roberts, of Mare Island, June 20.

Miss Ethel I. Husing was the sole member of the graduating class at the recent commencement exercises of the Convent of the Sacr d Heart at Oakland. Miss Husing is a bright young lady from San Mateo, and is grand-daughter of Senator Jas. D. Byrnes of that place. The exercises at the Convent were unusually interesting. Miss Husing's essay on "The Aim makes Great the Life" evidenced much thought and won high praise.

A thermostat has been designed to give warning of spontaneous combustion in coal pockets. A compound solder-release thermostat, incased and protected by iron pipe, is placed in the centre of every ten-feet cube of coal, both horizontally and vertically. The thermostat has two operating points, one at one hundred and fifty-five degrees, the other at two hundred and eighty-six degrees and, as these two points are reached, bells are rung, and warning given of an approaching fire. This has been tried in America.

Hard work does not hurt a well woman. It is the weak woman, suffering from diseases peculiar to her sex, who breaks down under the daily strain of household duties. For diseases of the delicate womanly organs Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is the standard remedy. Over half a million women owe health and happiness to Dr. Pierce's treatment.

"No tongue could express the pain that I endured before I commenced taking Dr. Pierce's medicine," writes Mrs. Mollie Colgate, of Randolph, Charlotte Co., Va. "I was not able to do anything at all. Could not eat anything except bread and tea—or if I did the top of my head hurt so it seemed it would kill me; but now I can eat a little of almost anything I want and can do a good day's work as well as any body can. Am better than I have been for years. I think your medicine is the best that ever was made for it is the only thing that ever did me any good. I tried many other kinds but none did me any good but your 'Favorite Prescription' and 'Golden Medical Discovery.' I can never praise them too highly."

Along the SEATTLE and INTERNATIONAL R. R.

To those who enthuse over scenic beauties or who feel delight in the contemplation of fertile fields cultivated by the skilled hand of the farmer, the ride from Seattle, Wash., to Vancouver, B. C., over the Seattle and International Railroad is ideal. In no part of the country has nature been more lavish than in the particularly rich territory traversed by this road, and the trip is an equal pleasure to the artist or photographer who seeks to reproduce the varied enticements of the landscape, and to the agriculturalist or dairyman who inspects the country with an eye to its present and future possibilities of production.

The line intersects four great valleys watered by four of the principal rivers of the famous Puget Sound country. Each valley is divided like a checker board, with farms of from twenty to 160 acres, on which fruits, vegetables, and cereals grow in abundance. Dairying and stock-raising are extensively engaged in because of the particular adaptability of the ground to these important industries. The cost of feeding and care of the dairy herd is made comparatively light by reason of the mild climate and luxurious growth of forage crops.

The results obtained under the most favorable conditions elsewhere, may as a rule, be more than reproduced from the virgin soil of these valleys, which seem to be particularly adapted to the raising of all root crops. On the uplands may be raised potatoes that in all points will rival the famous Greeleys of Colorado, and 600 bushels to the acre is a fair average yield. Rutabagas, mangel wurtzels, and in fact all of the coarser roots suitable for stock feed yield abundantly. The known area of land upon which the sugar beet can be successfully grown has been greatly augmented by the addition of Western Washington, where they can be produced as readily as any other crop and will average 35 tons per acre.

Of the cereals, oats, barley, and wheat are the leading crops in the order named, the average yield on good valley land being 100 bushels to the acre for oats, 80 bushels for barley, and 60 bushels for wheat;—good sweet corn can be raised, but field corn does not thrive.

Of forage crops, White Clover is preeminently the plant of the country. It is indigenous to the soil and as ubiquitous as the Johnson grass of the South, and will yield with the slightest encouragement from 4 to 6 tons to the acre. With this magnificent feed in such abundance the farmer is enabled to carry his stock through the winter on a very small amount of dry feed. Of the other varieties of grasses Millet and Timothy are most largely cultivated for hay.

From the line of the Seattle and International railroad a panoramic view is unfolded that, of its kind, is not surpassed anywhere in the United States. The first view of the Snohomish Valley is obtained as the train emerges through a gap in the hills at an elevation of about 200 feet above sea level. As one of the oldest settled parts of Western Washington, it naturally contains many of the best cleared farms in the district. From the Snohomish northward, to the Stillaguamish, a distance of 22 miles, the road continues through timber which everywhere covers the uplands and hills. The Stillaguamish drains a valley equally rich but not so well settled as the Snohomish; still northward 20 miles, it bridges the Skagit, and just beyond passes through the flourishing town of Sedro-Woolly, the hyphenated metropolis of the Skagit Valley. Sumas, the northern terminus of the line, is situated in the heart of the Nooksack county, famed for the excellence of its products, especially the fruits. Nooksack apples are noted in the markets of eastern cities where nine out of ten thousand boxes found a ready sale last year. The pear, prune, plum, cherry, and all small fruits do equally well, and are generally considered far superior in texture and flavor to the California article.

The Seattle & International Railway taps the richest mineral, agricultural, and timber districts of Western Washington and affords to intending settlers every opportunity for farming, prospecting, or lumbering. The heavy belts of timber on either side of this line hide the valleys that are immediately adjacent to it, and which are adapted by the most beautiful work of nature for farming, stock raising and dairy purposes.

IN BOOKDOM

I HAVE in my hand this week a book of short stories by Adachi Kinnosuke, the young Japanese writer whose work has been attracting considerable attention the past few years. Iroka: Tales of Japan, is the interesting title of this honorable book. Mr. Kinnosuke has some qualities that are usually lacking in Occidental writers; and conversely he lacks many of the qualities usually demanded in Western interpretations of life. He is a writer of "charm" rather than of "strength." He has not the gift of "imagination" in large degree. Instead, he has a very pretty gift of "fancy," which is quite a different matter. The gift of "fancy" is a prettier and more popular gift than that of deep imaginative insight. The charm of a well-turned conceit, indeed, will very often seem to the casual reader to be of the very highest order of excellence. A fanciful allusion in a description will very often seem to be the last word in the art of literary expression. In reality it may not be the last word. And yet it may be very pretty and entirely worthy of praise.

Let me quote a characteristic paragraph from Mr. Kinnosuke's charming book of tales. The conceit is exquisitely, phrased and shows its author at his best:

"Really it was a bit of gauze torn off from the skirt of that vain coquette called spring, in her all-too-hasty and careless way of passing over this earth, and which was caught by the bare branches which had stood lonely, looking very black and ugly upon the snow, all winter long. There were some, not many, who said that it was a cloud made up of tenjo's faces blushing over their face experience in love. An error. But, of course, we can see how they made a mistake like this, seeing that they were poets."

Again:

"The moon, red, and, like a ripe fruit, was falling into the silver plate of the sea."

In another place he describes a mother's despair:

"Her own daughter's voice!

"She reeled.

"Burning from the fire of her emotion and freezing from the ice of dread, almost at the same time; there she was, the mother! What an awful pendulum, swinging over the verge of insanity with heaven and earth in huge eruption before her eyes!"

Other favorite expressions are in the same manner:

"Dusk flew out of the skirts of the weeping willows."

"A thread of pale thin smoke—a stream of curled pathos—issued from its square opening, at once a chimney and a window."

"The sleepy moon reposed quietly on the graceful branch of the kikyo tree in the yard."

"Just then the flying squadron was flanking the Chinese right wing. It did, in truth, look as if some one had pulled up Asama, Vesuvius, and a couple more by the roots, had set them afloat on their sides, so that their craters shot at the horizon instead of the midday sun, and made them fly at the rate of fourteen knots an hour."

"The moon was lighting them, and so also the distant, star-like glimmer of lanterns held up by the twilight-sleeved arms of pine and cherry trees."

"A heavy thud!—and literally the eye-balls of the spectators almost jerked their heads off their shoulders in their hurry to leap out of their sockets."

"Looking toward the West, you could see the bedclothes of the sun on both sides of Fuji-yana. One would have said of the sunset clouds that some rude hands must have massacred angels without number and so outrageously—they were stained, those clouds, with blood of much richer brightness of red than that of mortals, and also they were covered with snowy downs."

All this is very pretty, graceful, charming, but it is not in the least imaginative. Neither is there any evidence in these stories that Mr. Kinnosuke is possessed of any considerable degree of imagination. "The accent of high seriousness, born of absolute sincerity," as Matthew Arnold used to say, is not in that kind of writing. It is built up chiefly of high-sounding, pretty conceits. None the less a pretty conceit, well phrased, is a very charming thing, and one that the world is not in any danger of undervaluing.

A considerable part of Mr. Kinnosuke's difficulty with himself undoubtedly lies in the clash between the artistic and ethical ideals of the Occidental and the Oriental civilivation. The Western attitude toward women, which is not only Western but also distinctly modern, an attitude at the root of all our great literature of chivalrous romance, cannot be reconciled with the Eastern idea between the covers of a single book of short stories. We feel all the while that Mr. Kinnosuke's idea of love is more or less mongrel, neither Western nor Eastern. We Westerners cannot see, for instance, why all the women in this little book commit hari-kari, sometimes for the most trifling reasons, judged by our standards; and our standards seem to be the ones by which the book was written. We cannot see why the love stories in spirit should be altogether Western. Were they Eastern in spirit, and not Western, the inevitable hari kari would in truth be inevitable. We should not then be disposed to criticise as paucity of invention the meagre plot, and as paucity of imagination the still more meagre characterization. We should not then feel the challenge upon us to judge of the story-telling by the most excellent Western workmanship we know. We could say, these stories are true to Eastern life, and we shall cherish them for their truth and their insight. Instead we say, these stories cannot be true to life, but nevertheless they are gracefully done, and we shall cherish them for their charm.

The Bewitched Fiddle is the title of the latest collection of tales by Seumas McManus, the young man who came over from Ireland a year or two ago, like the hero in one of his own fairy tales, with his pockets full of manuscripts, and went home again with every one of them turned into gold. And they were not new stories either—not all of them. "Och, but they tasted of Ireland," and that was the secret of the thing. The Bewitched Fiddle takes its title from the first story in the present little collection of ten. This title story is the very Irish of Donegal. It is as interesting as it could well be. And yet it is not a new tale. It is simply the "The Pied Piper of Hamelin" done into fascinating Irish prose by a fascinating young Irishman straight out of Ireland. And likewise "Pathrick's Poxy," which is neither more nor less than the John Alden story re-told; and the "Wisdom of Dark Patrick," re-telling the old story how the jingle of money is good payment for the smell of a meal; and so on. The book will not want for readers. Published by the Doubleday & McClure Co., New York.

The romance of adventure seems to be as popular as ever, if we may take published volumes in evidence. Before me are three novels, each excellent in its way. Two of the three are historical. The odd one is a tale of the famous little buffer kingdom lying somewhere between France, Germany and Holland. In all of them the action hangs upon the winning of a woman's priceless love by a certain wonderful knight who is possessed of all the graces and most of the virtues in the world. Which is always extremely interesting, when you think of it.

Robert Tounay is the name of one of these romances, with William Sage as the author of it and Houghton, Mifflin & Co. as publishers. In this case the story is historical, dealing with the period of the French Revolution. Robert Tournay, born a serving man, is the good genius of the tale. The heroine is the daughter of the noble house that commands him. Robert Tournay discovers that he loves the Mademoiselle de Rochefort, gets into an altercation with the noble cad her accepted lover, and flees for his life to Paris, where he becomes colonel in the Republican army. He is enabled to save the Mademoselle from the fate of other aristocrats by asserting her to be the Citizeness Tournay his wife. After conducting her to the German frontier he is thrown into prison by Robespierre, and very nearly loses his head; but the heroine opportunely discovers her own love for him, goes to Paris in disguise, and secures his release from Robespierre at the point of a pistol. After a great many exciting mix-ups Tournay is instrumental in bringing about the death of Robespierre upon the guillotine, and the situation is saved.

The other historical tale is called The Rebel, and purports to be the memoir of Arthony, fourth Earl of Cherwell, including an account of the rising at Taunton in 1684, complied and set forth by his cousin, Sir Hilary Mace, Bart., cited, with some notes by H. B. Marriott Watson. The book is published by Harper & Bros. The story tells how my lord Cherwell became interested in the pretty ward of an unscrupulous adventuress, one Lady Ellicott. The villain in the case was the Duke of York, who had a passion for the girl. My Lady Ellicott, in order to advance hsr interests at court, endeavored in every way to deliver her ward into the power of His Highness, but she was always foiled by my lord Cherwell, who ended by wining the heroine's love, marrying her, and at last falling in love with her right and tight. Unfortunately my lord was killed by a hired assassin just after the consummation of great happiness, but that does not affect the interest of the tale.

The buffer-kingdom romance is captioned The Conspirators, and is also published by the Harpers. Robert W. Chambers is the author of this tale of adventure, and he has introduced a novelty in heroes, one Lieutenant Hardy, of the United States army, present at Luxemburg in the interests of his government. The action has to do with the intrigues (the usual intrigues) of Germany, France, Holland, and the rest of them, for political advantage. Lieutenant Hardy helps to foil the conspirators. Incidentally he wins him a wife from the very highest ranks of the European nobility. There are two or three very interesting love stories involved in the tale, including one in which the Crown Prince of Germany figures with the young Queen of Holland—which is certainly modern enough even for Americans to admire.

Cures Poison Oak and All Skin Diseases. Sold by All Druggists.

$100 Reward $100

The reader of this paper will be pleased to learn that there is at least one dreaded disease that science has been able to cure in all its stages, and that is Catarrh. Hall's Catarrh Cure is the only positive cure known to the medical fraternity. Catarrh being a constitutional disease, requires a constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure is taken internally, acting directly upon the blood and mucous surfaces of the system, thereby destroying the foundation of the disease, and giving the patient strength by building up the constitution and assisting nature in doing its work. The proprietors have so much faith in its curative powers that they offer One Hundred Dollars for any case that it fails to cure. Send for list of testimonials.

A Military Fraud.

THIS happened years ago, when there was no war to hurry promotion and to cause raw boys to be bustled out to Africa, with commissions, to lead seasoned soldiers, after a training or two in the militia or yeomanry, or a few months at Sandhurst. There were limited vacancies and plenty of competition, while the invention of rules of thumb for the selection of fit soldiers to serve Her Majesty afforded scope for the ingenuity of examiners and saved trouble.

"It's no bally use, Tommy; I practically can't see a thing with my left." The Hon. Harold de Hochepied Josynghame had been looking at a card covered with black lines and spots, arranged in various groups and configurations; he had held it at all sorts of distances from his face and at all sorts of angles, and had closed his right eye as he did so. He added a word not taught by army crammers—at least not in their curriculum—and spun the card across the room, where it fell at the feet of Tom Smith, who looked at it without interest and sighed.

"I am awfully sorry, old chap," said his bosom friend, in a tone that hardly seemed to convey quite all the sympathy a friend's tone should. He must have been conscious of it, for he added apologetically: "I'm awfully sorry, you know, but I'm in the same box. There's no help for it; we can't pass the beastly exam. We could have passed into Sandhurst six months ago straight from school as far as the work goes, but we've got to pass the medical in less than six hours from now, and we can't either of us do it; that's all. We can't."

"It's harder on me than you." The Hon. Harold Josynghame looked on the point of tears; after all, if he was six feet high, he was practically a boy, and, if you took into consideration the de Hochepied interest at the Horse Guards, had a career before him. "I could see with both eyes a year ago, but you have always been a squabby little beggar."

Mr. Thomas Smith walked to the window and looked out moodily on Piccadily. They were in the smoking room of a club that gathers in many young men of blameless records and public school education, and welcomes them with open arms if their athletic repute has arrived before them. They had breakfasted early and had the room to themselves.

"Dunno," said Tommy Smith, still inclined to be unsympathetic. "If you will take on a coal-heaver you can't be surprised that he plugs you in the eye. Of course, it's deuced bad luck if the injury turns out permanent, but you shouldn't have done it."

"The brute was licking a woman," retorted the Hon. Harold Josynghame, "and you'd have done the same."

"Of course I should, but, then, if I am too short for the army by a good quarter of an inch, I've never been licked yet, and if I had got under his guard"——

"Then his wife would have fetched a fire shovel and taken you in the rear as she did me, the ungrateful beast! No, Tommy, you're as hard as nails and as strong as a bull and have a thick head, but you'd have been done, too."

"No good arguing about it," said Tommy, still downcast, and added, "I thought you couldn't draw the weight, either. Too light for your height, eh?"

"Oh, I settled that all right," said his friend. "I left off riding for three months, and took a fattening diet. I've put on nearly a stone. I'm not as hard as I was, of course, but I shall satisfy the regulations as far as weight goes."

"Did it hurt much at the time?"

"The eye? Pretty well; but I was so sore all over I hardly knew, and the whack with the shovel knocked me nearly silly. I had a lump on my head as big as a hen's egg."

"Pretty good pluck of you to take on a coal-heaver and his family," grunted his friend, "and jolly lucky the police came up. I suppose your eye is as bad as you think."

"Certainly; it's practically gone."

"You make me wonder if mine's all right. Take the card and try me, Joskin, there's a good chap. I see black spots buzzing about all over the place sometimes at night after mugging at anything in small print."

He stood at the other side of the room and answered questions as to the groups of lines and spots on the card with faultless accuracy.

"When they tell you to close one eye they expect you to put your hand over it," said Mr. Josynghame; "of course, it makes no difference."

"Suspicious beasts," answered Tommy Smith; but he said, a moment later, "I don't know, though; try me again."

"Rot," said Mr. Josynghame, and he repeated his former directions to close the right eye or the left, with the same result of perfectly correct answers.

"Do you mind looking at me once more," said Tommy Smith, in a breathless tone. "Try to think I might be a very slippery sort of chap with a glass eye trying to kid you."

"Rot!" said Mr. Josynghame again, wearily. The performance was gone through again with the same result, and then he added: "Your right hand is about as shapeless as your left, Tommy, but neither is transparent. I should h ave spotted you if you had squinted through your fingers; my eye is good enough for that."

"You did not spot me, all the same," said his friend, coolly. "I used my right eye all the time. When you said 'Cover your left eye,' I covered it with my left hand; when you said 'Cover your right eye,' I put up my right hand, but I covered my left eye again, not my right at all."

Josynghame whistled, and his face lit up perceptibly.

"Of course, the doctor chap may not be such an ass as you," suggested Tommy Smith, still looking gloomy.

"I'll try it," said Josynghame quietly. He had been covering his left eye first with one hand and then the other. "I quite see their point of view; but hang it, if my good eye goes, and I have to leave the service blind, it's my loss as well as theirs."

"And if you become commander-in-chief you'll have gone one better than Nelson. He wasn't blind when he started, and didn't have to spoof a medical board before he got a show; he'd never have got one at all if he had. After all, if you fail, you may look a fool for five seconds—they won't give you longer to think about it—and even then you will be no worse off than you are now."

For five minutes they smoked cigarettes in silence. Suddenly Tommy Smith gave a wriggle in his deep armchair, and sat up, with the first smile on his chubby face that had appeared there that morning. While devising juggles for his friend he had been perfectly solemn; indeed, they both had been. After all, as has been stated, they were at the turning point of their careers.

"By George!" said Tommy Smith, "I'm a much cleverer chap than you, Joskin. I've got it. How big was the bump on your head?"

"As big as a house or a hen's egg, to judge from what it felt like."

"Half an inch high?" asked Tommy.

"Rather!"

"And the shovel?" A new waiter had made up the fire, and forgotten that the heavy and grimy implement he had used was not part of the usual smoking room furniture. Tommy Smith had picked it up and was thrusting it toward his friend. "As big as that?" he asked.

"I never saw the shovel," said Harold Josynghame; "the police told me about it afterward. I knew all about the bump, though, by then—I couldn't get my hat on."

"Joskin," said Tommy Smith, presenting the handle of the club shovel, "be a pal. I'm as near as a toucher a quarter of an inch under height, rather more than less. Put a bump onto my head half an inch high, and I'm through the medical like a hot knife through butter."

Mr. Josynhame took the shovel and looked at him admiringly. "Mean it?" he asked.

"Rather," said his friend. "I'll take it sitting, though. Look sharp, before any one cones in." He sat upright in his chair, gripping the arms of it and clenching his teeth. "Go on. I'll shut my eyes, if you'd rather."

Spang! The Shovel came down on the skull of Mr. Tommy Smith with a sound like a cracked bell, muffled. He gave a little gasp.

"Harder, old chap," he said, blinking, "and a little more in the middle. Can't—you—swing—it—a—bit?"

Spang! It descended again and Tommy Smith gasped and turned red first, then white. A member of the club had opened the door as the blow fell. He gasped, too, dropped a cigarette in an amber mouthpiece fully four inches long, recovered it much damaged, and retired precipitately under the impression that two of his fellow members were settling an affair of honor with the fire irons after drawing lots. He was a gentleman of honor and discretion himself, and he felt that he had no right to intrude or to mention it to the committee.

It was a minute or two before Tommy spoke.

"All right," he said at last, with an uncertain smile, and his friend looked relieved. "I saw a hatful of stars that time. I should think that would work it. I'll sit here—five minutes. Then we'll start. When we're once there, the longer the beggars keep us waiting the better. I feel my hair sitting up already."

Ten minutes later, as they were getting into a hansom, his friend inquired how he felt.

"I suppose I've got a headache," he answered. "I've never had such a thing before, but the bump's rising beautifully."

And did they 'pass their medical?' And did they otherwise satisfy their examiners as to their fitness to hold commissions in Her Majesty's army? I can only say that that night a short, square built youth journeyed from his club to a lodging house in Jermyn street on the roof of a four-wheeler, after offering to carry the cab on his back down Piccadilly, and that the butler at Josynghame House, Knightsbridge, had to help one of the younger hopes of the family and tell his lady mother that much work had made Mr. Harold a bit dizzy.—Pall Mall Gazette.

What Are Club Cocktails?
"A MODERN ECSTASY" is a Shakespearian definition for a "Cocktail." "Kings it makes gods, and meaner creatures kings."
Wherever good livers are found, wherever conviviality exists, even to the most remote corners of the earth, the "CLUB COCKTAIL" reigns supreme as a fashionable drink.
The "CLUB COCKTAILS" never vary; they are always the same. The secret of their perfect blend is that they are kept six months before being drawn off and bottled.
"Cocktails" that are served over the bar do not contain these indispensable qualities.
Seven Varieties: Manhattan, Martini, Vermouth, Holland Gin, York, Tom Gin, Whisky.

MONTROSE BICYCLE SENT FREE
on approval to your address WITHOUT A CENT IN ADVANCE. SEND US YOUR ORDER, state whether you wish lady's or man's wheel; give color, height of frame and gear wanted and WE WILL SHIP THE WHEEL C. O. D. on approval, allowing you to uncrate and examine it fully before you accept it. If it is not all and more than we claim for it, and a better wheel than you can get for any where near the price from any one else, refuse it and we will pay all express charges ourselves. The "MONTROSE" Bicycle at our Special Agent's sample price of $16.50 is the greatest bargain in a bicycle ever offered. We guarantee it equal to any $40 wheel on the market, and you need not accept it nor pay a cent if you do not find it as we represent. We are EXCLUSIVE BICYCLE MANUFACTURERS and take this method of quickly introducing our 1900 MODELS. This offer of a sample wheel at this low price is made to secure a RIDER AGENT in each town to represent us and take orders. Our agents make money fast.
SPECIFICATIONS. Frame, 22, 24 or 26 inch; ladies, 22 inch. Best Shelby seamless tubing with forged connections, flush joints, improved expander device to fasten seat post and handle bar; Royal Arch crown; the celebrated Mavis hubs and hanger - the easiest running known; Record "A" tires, the best and one of the most expensive tires on the market. The genuine $4 Mesinger Hygienic saddle; pedals, tools and accessories the best obtainable. Enameled in black, maroon or coach green, highly finished and ornamented; special finished nickeling on all bright parts. We thoroughly test every piece of material that goes into this machine. Our binding year's guarantee bond with each bicycle.
FREE to any one sending the $16.50 cash in full with order we will send free a genuine Burdick 10,000 mile barrel pattern cyclometer; or a high grade floor pump. Your money all back if you are not perfectly satisfied.
CHEAP WHEELS. We do not manufacture the cheap department store kind of wheels, such as many new concerns and big supply houses advertise and sell as high grade. We can furnish them, however, at $5 to $7 stripped; or $9.75 to $12.50 complete. We do not guarantee nor recommend them. BEFORE ORDERING a bicycle of any one else, no matter who or how cheap, write us and let us tell you how much we can save you on the same machine.
If you are UNABLE to BUY a wheel we can assist you to EARN A BICYCLE by distributing catalogues for us a few days. We need one person in each town for this purpose. We have several hundred SECOND HAND WHEELS taken in trade which we will close out at $8 to $10 each; also some shopworn samples and '99 models very cheap. Send for Bargain List. OUR RELIABILITY is unquestioned. We refer to any bank or business house in Chicago, or any express or railroad company. We will send you letters of reference direct from the largest banks in Chicago if you wish it.

AT THE THEATERS

THE farce comedy is American. C. Hoyt, the Honorable Charles Hoyt of the Vermont legislature, was its creator. Those plays of his which jumped so suddenly into the public eye twelve or fifteen years ago are not the ephemeral things that we all prophesied; they seem to have the classic in them; for they live and perennially bloom and each time please. Therefore their fun is genuine, they come to fill a want, they last because people wish to see them, are willing to pay their gold dollars to enjoy their wit, incongruous situations and clever josh. Their is nothing to take their place. The old time specialty companies have gone aglimmering. Vaudeville has risen and soon we will leave Henry Irving and Richard Mansfield doing a turn upon the variety stage unless something happens to diminish the vaudeville boom. The farce-comedy of the Hoyt school is more however than a series of clever specialties, it is an idea plus the song and dance, a satire relieved by irrelevant whimsicalities. There will be something as its outgrowth, what that something will be the wise man, even the manager, cannot foresee.

It looks as if it were a piece of daring that moved success, this bringing of a star stock company of farce-commedians to California who will give through a series of weeks a revival of the good old things. Certainly, so far the management has to pat itself upon the back. For the houses to which Dunne and Ryley's people have presented "The Rag Baby" have been crowded. And to hear them laugh those happy people who hold their sides as Matthews, Bulger and the rest toss out the fun—well, it is worth the money just to see the audience and know that the whole world is not blase and sorry it was born.

I frankly wish that Mr. Friedlander would present a few more good looking girls—they pay my dear Mr. Manager, and they are not scarce here. Of course the prettiest ones seldom are the cleverest. But that's just it, you don't want cleverness all the time. One can't be forever, like the Prince in the fable, waking the maiden to hear her sing. Give us a drop now of beauty and the California company will be all that heart and eye and ear could wish in the way of a farce-comedy troupe.

Of the morals of "Sapho," the play, and "Sapho" the book, I leave others to judge. The subject has been threshed over these many months; it is fruitless at the best. Here is a frank, free exposition of the manners and life of the half-world and a great story of that life. If anyone can draw a moral therefrom, let him do so. Myself, I have always felt that "Sapho", the book, should be distributed free as a tract. And for myself, I also feel that much of the moral is lost in "Sapho" the play. It may be the changes made in in Fitch's adaption, it may be the acting, it may be both; certain it is that there has been a curious twisting and turning and changing of the point of view. In the book, Jean Gaussin is a crude boy who comes up to school in the metropolis, falls into the toils of a worthless, degenerate woman, gives up all for her and is finally deserted by her in the end. In the play, Sapho is a fallen but noble woman who is madly infatuated with an attractive but selfish man, who alternately spurns her and plays with her, and she deserts him in the end because the mother instinct is roused in her by her child. It misses the moral, but it keeps the story.

But after all, art has nothing to do with morals. Sapho is altogether a more agreeable and less harmful play than "In Paradise", let us say, or "The Girl from Maxims" or any of those Frenchy "tobasco comedies" which treat stolen fruits in the spirit of levity and farce. "Sapho" is a play about a degenerate, perhaps, but the point of view is not degenerate as in that frankly-confessed drama "The Degenerates," It is art, it is a bit of life. If you are grown up and mature and understand those things, there is no good reason that I can see why you should taboo "Sapho." I would take no honest woman to see "In Paradise," which San Francisco passed by without comment; I would take the most chaste matron of my acquaintance to "Sapho," and esteem her better for knowing that there are hearts and affections on the other side of the line.

Florence Roberts played it well at the Alcazar this week; indeed, there were those in the audience who had already seen Olga Nethersole do it in New York and who declared that, leaving aside the Nethersole physique, Florence Roberts vastly excelled her in art. Miss Roberts, always an excellent emotional actress, is deepening and improving. After the first act, where the Alcazer people rather failed in the effort to "jolly up," the performance was consistent throughout. But "Sapho" is a play of one part, after all and Florence Roberts is all that can be desired in that part.

The Orpheum bill is at its height again. No more clever and jolly actress than Carrie de Mar has been seen on the local variety stage this season; with Joseph Hart, she forms a team which has no superior in the country. Lillian Burkhardt, the talented Californienne, keeps her hold on the audiences. She is that rare combination, a "natural" actress who can command both comedy and pathos. Next week, Van & Nebriga with a new sketch, "My Busy Day." The Merrils are trick bicyclists from Berlin. John Camp, "The man who never smiles," is a monologue artist of note and Sydney Dean is a character singer. Lillian Burkhart has a new sk tch, "Fifty Years Ago," written by John Davies of San Francisco.

Dunne and Ryley's all star cast has made a tremendous hit at the California Theater. Beginning to-morrow night "A Tin Soldier," the amusing satire on the plumbing business, will be produced. Matthews and Bulger will sing their famous "Money in the Bank" and the piece will be filled with specialties.

This week ends the record-breaking date of the Goodwins at the Columbia. It will be long before San Francisco sees such a combination of play and acting again. Next week comes Kellar, the magician, with a dozen new illusions each of which will occupy the entire stage of the theatre and countless smaller ones. Popular prices will govern this engagement.

The Henry Miller season opens at the Columbia theatre on Monday, the 25th inst. The play is to be Jerome K. Jerome's comedy success "Miss Hobbs" and it is promised even a greater cast than the one that appeared in the piece in New York and London. Margaret Anglin will play the title role.

"Sapho" seems to be in for an indefinitely long run at the Alcazar. Seats are selling six days in advance. The production will be continued until further notice.

When taken at the proper time a little Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey will prevent a cold.
